PRAISE FOR PREVIOUS EDITIONS OF CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY: AN INTRODUCTION

“This book is an extraordinary achievement, a tour de force which will introduce thousands of students to theology as a discipline with a rich heritage, a clear sense of its own methods and norms, and an elusive yet articulate understanding of Christian language.” Reviews in Religion and Theology

“‘Introduction’ is perhaps too modest a word for a book which gives a basic introduction to almost every aspect of the history and theology of Christianity. It is clearly written, fairly argued, and very reasonably priced. McGrath has set a standard that will not be broken for a very long time.” Theology

“There is much to admire in Dr. McGrath's skill as a pedagogue. The range of issues he deals with is marvellously broad, and he says a great many things which are important, beautiful, true and worth knowing.” Church Times

“McGrath has surpassed even himself in ... Christian Theology: An Introduction. His assumption that the reader has little theological expertise and reads only English makes the book extremely valuable to beginners in theology. ... His purpose is not to pre-scribe but to describe Christian Theology.” Trinity Journal

“This is an admirable textbook which will soon grace many shelves.” Expository Times

“[McGrath] lets the Church and its classic traditions speak for themselves, rather than expostulating on his own arguments and opinions. His own constructive work takes the form of addressing, in light of Scripture and tradition, some of the burning issues in the Church today. The happy result is that the shape of the questions is contemporary while the substance of the answers is deeply traditional.” First Things

“This publication is a seminal text for the student or teacher of Christian Theology. Its readability and general presentation make it a very accessible text for those with a general interest in this area of academic endeavor. In essence this is a text which would be a useful and valuable resource for the teacher or student of theology. For school-based practitioners it is a very sound teacher reference text. It contains in one volume a very thorough treatment of the key developments in Christian Theology over the past 2,000 years.”

PREFACE

The great Swiss theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968) offers us a vision of Christian theology at its finest. It is, he suggests, like the great landscapes of Tuscany or Umbria, which move both our heads and our hearts, holding us in awe on account of the breathtaking views which they offer. Even the most distant perspectives seem incredibly clear. Barth is but one of many theologians to have stressed the sheer intellectual excitement that the study of Christian theology can impart, not to mention its capacity to bring new depth to the life of faith. To study theology is to set out on a voyage of discovery that is at times enriching, at times challenging, but always profoundly interesting.

This book is written in the conviction that Christian theology is one of the most fascinating subjects anyone can hope to study. As Christianity enters into a new phase of expansion, especially in the Pacific Rim, the study of Christian theology will continue to have a key role to play in modern intellectual culture. It also remains of seminal importance to anyone wishing to understand the central issues and preoccupations of the Middle Ages or the European Reformation, as well as many other periods in human history.

Yet, as a professional teacher of Christian theology at Oxford University for more than thirty years, I have become painfully aware that this sense of enthusiasm and excitement seems rare among university and seminary students of theology. They are more often baffled and bewildered by the frequently confusing vocabulary of Christian theology, the apparent unintelligibility of much recent writing in the field, and that writing's seeming irrelevance to the practical issues of Christian living and ministry. As someone who believes that Christian theology is among the most rewarding, fulfilling, and genuinely exciting subjects anyone can ever hope to study, I have worked hard to try to remedy this situation. This book, which arises out of more than three decades of teaching theology to undergraduates and seminarians at Oxford University and beyond, is a response to that concern. It took me ten years to work out how best to present and explain many of the ideas conveyed in this work, using student lecture audiences as testing grounds for the various approaches I conceived.

I wrote this book back in 1993 because it was obvious that there was an urgent need for an entry-level introduction to Christian theology. Too many existing introductions of that age made what experience shows to have been hopelessly optimistic assumptions about how much their readers already knew. In part, this reflects a major religious shift within western culture. Many students now wishing to study Christian theology are recent converts. Unlike their predecessors in past generations, they possess little inherited understanding of the nature of Christianity, its technical vocabulary, or the structure of its thought. Theology thus needs to be introduced and explained to these students, whose enthusiasm for their subject outweighs their lack of base knowledge. This book is a genuine introduction, assuming that its readers know nothing about Christian theology. Everything is introduced clearly, and set out as simply as possible. Simplicity of expression and clarity of exposition are the core virtues that have been pursued in writing this work.

For some, this will mean that the resulting work lacks sophistication and originality. Those qualities are certainly valuable in other contexts. They are not, however, appropriate to a book of this kind. Originality implies novelty and development; in writing this book, I have deliberately avoided imposing my own ideas as if these were of any interest or importance. Educational considerations have been given priority over everything else. My aim in this work has not been to persuade, but to explain. I have no interest in imposing my own views on anyone; my hope is simply to provide a gateway to the riches of Christian theology.

This book is therefore descriptive, not prescriptive. It does not seek to tell its readers what to believe, but rather aims to explain to them what has been believed, in order to equip them to make up their minds for themselves. It does this by describing options available to them, and those options' historical origins, and enabling them to understand the options' strengths and weaknesses through a process of analysis and reflection.

As the title and contents make clear, this is an introduction to Christian theology, rather than any specific form or school of Christian theology. It engages with the core themes of the great tradition of Christian thought down the centuries, which are common to all Christian denominations and groups. Recent years have seen the emergence of a “theology of retrieval and reappropriation” across the entire spectrum of Christian thought, as theologians have realized the importance and usefulness of theological dialogue with the past. This book is ideally placed to help its readers gain an appreciation of the rich resources of the Christian tradition. Although this is not a work of Catholic, Orthodox, or Protestant theology, great care has been taken to ensure that Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant perspectives and insights are represented and explored.

Inevitably, this approach means that the discussion of many questions of Christian theology – especially questions of method – is somewhat limited. If my own notes are anything to go by, it would take a volume nearly five times the size of this one to do anything even approaching justice to the complexities of many of the issues raised. Readers therefore need to appreciate that what is being offered is an introduction, a sketched map, in order that they can pursue these questions in greater detail, having at least gained some understanding of what is at stake. My own experience strongly suggests that students stand a far better chance of understanding and appreciating seminal issues if someone is prepared to take the trouble to explain the background to the discussion, the nature and significance of the questions being debated, and the terminology being used. I have assumed that my readers will know no language other than English, and have explained and provided a translation of every Latin, Greek, and German word and phrase that has become an accepted part of the theologian's vocabulary.

Sadly, there is not space to discuss every theological development, movement, or writer which one might hope to include in a work of this sort. Time and time again, pressure on space has forced me to leave out some material which many readers will feel ought to have been included, or give a less full account of some questions than I would have liked. I can only apologize for these shortcomings, of which I am only too painfully aware. The selection of matters to be discussed – and the manner in which they were discussed – in the first edition of this work was based upon first-hand recent experience of teaching and on careful surveys of student opinion in many countries that aimed to discover both what students thought ought to be included in this volume and what they find difficult to understand, and hence what requires extended explanation.

This survey was extended for the purposes of subsequent editions to include a large number of those involved in the teaching of systematic theology; wherever possible, their suggestions for alterations and improvement were included. The fourth edition involved more extensive consultation than usual, and led to a major rewriting of the text, with substantial changes being made at several points. The “Acknowledgments” section details those who were kind enough to assist in this way. It is clear that these improvements were widely welcomed. The entire text was reviewed for clarity of presentation, while including a significant amount of additional material requested by many users. After twenty years, however, it became clear that the structure of the work needed modification to reflect more accurately the way in which theology was being taught in colleges and seminaries. The sixth edition includes a new chapter on the Holy Spirit, which many readers have requested. This welcome development means that some material has had to be rearranged to allow the best possible presentation of ideas. Readers who are interested in these changes might like to consult the brief section of this work which sets them out fully and clearly (see “The Structure of the Book: The Fifth and Sixth Editions Compared”).

It is my hope that this new edition of this work, published to mark the 25th anniversary of its original publication, will help its readers to discover the intellectual and spiritual riches and riddles, delights and debates of Christian theology. I count it a privilege to be your guide as you begin the exploration of the vast territory of the mind that lies ahead. Both the publisher and I would be delighted to have any suggestions you might like to make about how this journey of discovery might be made easier, more interesting, or more worthwhile.

TO THE STUDENT: HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Christian theology is one of the most fascinating subjects it is possible to study. This book aims to make that study as simple and as rewarding as possible. It has been written assuming that you know nothing about Christian theology. Obviously, the more you already know, the easier you will find this volume to handle. By the time you have finished this work, you will know enough to be able to follow most technical theological discussions and arguments, benefit from specialist lectures, and get the most from further reading.

Precisely because this book is comprehensive, it includes a lot of material – considerably more than is included in most introductions of this kind. You must not be frightened by the amount of material that this volume includes; you do not need to master it all. Considerable thought has been given to the best way of organizing the material. Grasping the structure of the work – which is quite simple – will allow it to be used more effectively by both students and teachers. The book is divided into three major parts.

The first part, entitled “Landmarks,” deals with the historical development of Christian theology. These four chapters give historical information which introduces some key terms and ideas that you will encounter in your study of theology, some of which will not be explained again. This volume works on the basis of “explain it the first time round.” To understand fully the key theological issues you will encounter later in this work, you need to know a little about their historical background.

You also need to know something about the debates over the sources and methods of Christian theology – in short, where Christianity gets its ideas from. The second part of the work introduces you to these issues, and will equip you to deal with the material covered in the third part.

The final part of the book, which is also the longest, consists of ten chapters dealing with the major doctrinal issues of Christian theology – what Christians believe about God, Jesus Christ, and heaven, to mention only three of the important topics covered in this section. This material is organized thematically, and you should have no difficulty in finding your way to the material appropriate to your needs. The “Contents” pages will give you a good idea of where each specific discussion is to be found. If you have any difficulties, use the index. The order of presentation of the material in this section has been altered from that in the fifth edition, in response to extensive consultation with users: for details, see the section “The Structure of the Book: The Fifth and Sixth Editions Compared.”

However, there is no need to read every chapter in this book, nor need you read them in the order in which they are set out. Each chapter can be treated as a more or less self-contained unit. The book includes internal cross-references, which will ensure that you can follow up related matters which arise in the course of each and every chapter. Once more, it must be stressed that you must not let the sheer length of the book intimidate you; it is long because it is comprehensive, and gives you access to all the information that you will need. It aims to be a one-stop freestanding reference book which will cover all the material that you are likely to need to know about.

If you are using the book to teach yourself theology, it is recommended that you read the chapters in the order in which they are presented. You will find the video and audio material available on the publisher's website helpful in introducing the overall approach of this textbook and how to get the most out of using it; these materials also provide introductions to each chapter. However, if you are using the book in conjunction with a taught course, you can easily work out how the sections of the book relate to the materials used by your teacher. If in doubt, ask for guidance.

If you come across terms which you do not understand, you have three options. First, try the glossary at the end of the work, which may give you a brief definition of the term. Second, try the index, which will provide you with a more extensive analysis of key discussion locations within the volume. And, third, you can carry out a search on the Internet for a definition and discussion of the term in question.

Full references are provided to the sources of all major quotations within this work. The “Sources of Citations” section will allow you to track down the quotation and study it at length in its proper context. Full extracts of many of these texts are provided in the widely used companion volume to this introduction, The Christian Theology Reader, now in its fifth edition. Appropriate cross-references will allow you to take things further if you want to, without placing you at a disadvantage if you do not.

A dedicated website has been established for this work, and it includes extensive and detailed bibliographies for every chapter and video and audio resources (including podcasts) that will help you begin to study theology and use this textbook. This website will be updated regularly, and will help you to identify suitable material for further reading. This website is not password protected. The address is: www.wiley.com/legacy/wileychi/mcgrath.

Finally, be assured that everything in this book – including the contents of this work, the way in which the material has been arranged, the style of writing used, and the explanations offered – has been checked by student audiences and individual readers in Australasia, Canada, China, Hong Kong, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The work is probably about as user-friendly as you can get. But both the author and publisher welcome suggestions from teachers and students for further improvement, and these will be included in later editions of the work.

TO THE TEACHER: HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Christian theology is a subject which ought to excite students. In practice, both student and teacher often find the teaching of the subject to be difficult, and occasionally rather depressing. The student is discouraged by the vast amount of material it is necessary to grasp before “getting to the interesting bits” – as one Oxford student once put it to me. Teachers find the subject difficult for two main reasons. First, they want to introduce and discuss advanced ideas but find that students are simply unable to appreciate and understand these, due to a serious lack of background knowledge. Second, teachers find that they lack the time necessary to introduce students to the substantial amount of basic theological vocabulary and knowledge required.

This book aims to deal with both these difficulties and to liberate teachers from the often tiring and tedious business of teaching entry-level theology. This book will allow your students to acquire a surprisingly large amount of information in a short time. You may find it helpful to read the advice given to students (p. xxvii) to get an idea of how the book can be used. From your perspective as a teacher, however, the following points should be noted.

The contents of this book can be mastered without the need for any input on your part. Every explanation which this book offers has been classroom-tested on students at university and college level in Australasia, Canada, China, Hong Kong, the United Kingdom, and the United States and refined until students reported that they could understand the points being made without the need for further assistance. For example, we know that students as young as 16 years are using this work in the United Kingdom, and finding it intelligible and interesting. You should be able to invite students to read this book as essential background to your own teaching, thus enabling you to deal with more advanced and interesting themes in classroom time. The hard work has been done for you, to allow you to enjoy and develop your own teaching without having to spend valuable time on basic introductory issues.

A new feature provided for this latest edition of this work will make your task much easier. A series of video and audio resources have been developed especially for this work, and in them I introduce the textbook and its approach, as well as give students an overview of many of the issues that will be covered in the textbook. These resources have been designed to be very informal and accessible, and ought to help your students gain both confidence and familiarity with the material more rapidly than would otherwise be possible.

If you have used previous editions of this work for your teaching, you should note the rearrangement of material in Part III, resulting from the introduction of a new chapter on the Holy Spirit. This new chapter has been requested by many users and fits in well with many lecture courses in colleges and seminaries. Some material in adjacent chapters has been rearranged to allow for a smooth flow of presentation. You will find the changes set out more fully in the section “The Structure of the Book: The Fifth and Sixth Editions Compared,” which will allow you to compare the structures of the two editions and make any necessary changes to your lecture notes or accompanying materials.

This textbook is theologically neutral; it does not advocate any denominational agenda. It reports criticisms made of positions but does not itself criticize those positions. It does not tell its readers what to think but tells them what has been thought. My primary goals in this book have been to introduce readers to the themes of Christian theology and to enable them to understand them. This means that I have included discussion of many theological positions that are not my own, and tried to present them as accurately and fairly as possible. We know that this feature of this textbook is hugely valued by its readers, and it is our intention to maintain it. Readers of this text who believe that any positions are misrepresented are invited to write to the author or publisher, so that appropriate corrections can be made in future editions.

Because it aims to be clear, fair, and balanced, this textbook will allow you, as the teacher, to build your own distinct approach or understanding on the foundations which it lays. Thus the work will help your students to understand Aquinas (or Augustine or Barth or Luther) but it will not ask them to agree with Aquinas (or Augustine or Barth or Luther). The book aims to put you, the teacher, in the position of interacting with the classic resources of the Christian tradition, on the basis of the assumption that your students, through reading this book, will have a good basic understanding of the issues.

You may like to note that the first four chapters (Part I) offer an overview of historical theology; the next four chapters (Part II) a brief overview of aspects of philosophical theology and questions of theological method, including many questions usually described as “fundamental theology”; and the remaining ten chapters (Part III) deal with the leading themes of systematic theology. The work aims to include a fair and representative selection of the contributions of Christian theologians over two thousand years.

You will notice that the work includes generous quotations from the original works of theologians. This is a deliberate matter of policy. It is important that your students get into the habit of reading theologians, rather than just reading what has been written about them. The work aims to encourage students to interact with original texts, and offers them help in doing so. If you find this practice valuable, you might like to think of using the companion volume to this work, The Christian Theology Reader. This work offers its readers the opportunity to engage with more than 350 original sources – substantially more than any other such textbook – while providing far more help with this process of engagement than is normally found. Each reading in The Christian Theology Reader is provided with its own individual introduction, commentary, and study questions, and is fully sourced so that it can be followed through to its original context without difficulty.

If you are teaching a course on the basic themes of systematic theology, it is strongly recommended that you ask your students to read the first eight chapters before the course commences. This will give them the background knowledge that they will need to get the most from your teaching. You will find the questions at the end of each of those chapters helpful in judging whether the students have understood what they were asked to read – or, indeed, whether they read it at all!

Because this work is introductory, from time to time certain issues are introduced or explained more than once. This is a deliberate matter of policy, resting on the observation that some readers skip chapters in their haste to get to the bits that they think are really important – and, in doing so, miss out on some relevant material. The book works at its best if the chapters are read in the order in which they are presented; however, it is sufficiently flexible to permit other approaches to using it.

Additional teaching aids for this volume will be provided through its dedicated website, maintained by the publisher, which includes full bibliographies for each chapter (which will be updated regularly), dedicated video and audio resources (including podcasts), and links to theological resources on the Internet. This supersedes the older practice of providing printed reading lists, which date quickly and are often not particularly comprehensive. In addition, this site is being developed to include lecture outlines, test questions, and answers. Please visit this site to see whether it offers anything that might be useful to you. You are welcome to suggest additional readings, links, or other resources that would make this website more useful. This dedicated website is not password protected, and can be used by anyone with access to the Internet. The website address is:

The author and publisher are committed to ensuring that this work remains as helpful and as thorough as possible, and welcome comments or suggestions for improvement. In particular, we welcome being told of any approaches to teaching any aspect of Christian theology that you have found helpful in the classroom.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK: THE FIFTH AND SIXTH EDITIONS COMPARED

Both the author and publisher take feedback very seriously, and have introduced many improvements over the six editions of this work to ensure that it meets the needs of its many users, both students and teachers. During the past five years, we have received many requests for a separate chapter to be introduced that is dedicated specifically to the Holy Spirit. This reflects changes in the way in which Christian theology is now taught, and also the growing profile of the charismatic movement, especially within mainstream Christian denominations. In earlier editions, the material relating to the Holy Spirit was contained in sections of the chapter discussing the doctrine of the Trinity. The sixth edition now includes a new chapter dealing specifically with the theology of the Holy Spirit, and it includes expanded discussion of this important theological theme.

This has led to some related changes, designed to make the book as easy to use as possible. For pedagogical reasons, the chapter dealing with the doctrine of the Trinity (which originally followed immediately after the chapter dealing with the doctrine of God) has been moved so that it follows the new chapter on the Holy Spirit. It is much easier for readers to grasp some important aspects of the doctrine of the Trinity if they are already familiar with the theology of the Holy Spirit, especially the classic patristic debates concerning the divinity of the Spirit. A secondary change, again reflecting user feedback, is to reduce the amount of material relating to the “quest for the historical Jesus,” and relocate this at an appropriate point in the major chapter dealing with Christology.

These changes can be summarized as follows. No changes have been made to the order of presentation of material in Part I and Part II of this work; the topics and order of the first eight chapters remain unaltered. The order of the ten chapters which make up Part III of this work have been changed, for the reasons indicated above.

VIDEO AND AUDIO RESOURCES

To mark the 25th anniversary of this textbook, we have introduced a feature that we believe will be hugely welcome to its users. A series of video and audio presentations (including podcasts) have been specifically developed for the sixth edition of Christian Theology: An Introduction. All have been written specially for this purpose by Alister McGrath, and are presented by him. These can be accessed directly and free of charge from video and audio file-sharing websites, through the page devoted to Alister McGrath's theology textbooks at the publisher's website:

These resources can also be used for earlier editions of Christian Theology: An Introduction, although changes in the presentation of the material (see pp. xxxiii–xxxiv) have led to alterations to chapter titles and contents at several points in Part III of this volume.

The video presentations are offered in two formats, differing in image quality. These files include on-screen material to help you follow the presentation. The audio presentations have been scripted and recorded with the specific needs of audio users in mind, allowing you to study theology while driving or jogging.

The author and publisher will be delighted to receive further suggestions for material, which will be added to the website from time to time.

INTRODUCTION

Anyone who thinks about the great questions of Christian theology soon finds out that a lot of them have already been addressed. It is virtually impossible to do theology as if it had never been done before. There is always an element of looking back over one's shoulder to see how things were done in the past, and what answers were then given. Part of the notion of “tradition” is a willingness to take seriously the theological heritage of the past. Although this emphasis on taking the past seriously is mainly associated with Catholic and Orthodox theologians, many Protestant writers would concur. The great Protestant theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968) is one of many to note and affirm the continued importance of the great theological luminaries of the past in today's theological debates:

With regard to theology, we cannot be in the church without taking responsibility as much for the theology of the past as for the theology of our own present day. Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Luther, Schleiermacher and all the others are not dead but living. They still speak and demand a hearing as living voices, as surely as we know that they and we belong together in the church.

Most works of Christian theology – whether Catholic, Protestant, or Orthodox – engage with major writers from the past, simply because those writers remain such an important resource for Christian theological reflection today. It is therefore important to become familiar with the main voices and conversations of the Christian past, which are interesting in themselves and also provide vital reference points for the debates of our own time.

In practice, there is widespread agreement over the broad division of the history of Christian theology for teaching purposes. In this brief (but important) survey of the development of Christian theology, we shall consider four periods of thought, as follows:

- the patristic period, c.100–c.700 (chapter 1);
- the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, c.700–c.1500 (chapter 2);
- the Reformation and post-Reformation periods, c.1500–c.1750 (chapter 3);
- the modern period, c.1750 to the present day (chapter 4).

There is always going to be debate about these divisions, which may seem a little arbitrary. When did the patristic age end? Or the Middle Ages begin? The great Cambridge historian George Macaulay Trevelyan (1876–1962) wisely reminds us that historical “periods” are best seen simply as helpful constructions, rather than as well-defined realities. “Unlike dates, periods are not facts. They are retrospective conceptions that we form about past events, useful to focus discussion, but very often leading historical thought astray.”

Trevelyan's point is well taken. Nevertheless, we still need to try to organize the material into workable blocks or sections, rather than rambling aimlessly through the vast amount of theological discussion of the past two thousand years.

This opening section of this textbook provides an introductory panorama of some landmarks in theological reflection. It surveys some of the most important developments associated with these four eras, including:

- the geographical location of centers of Christian thought;
- the main theological issues under debate;
- the schools of thought associated with theological issues;
- the leading theologians of the period, and their particular concerns.

So let's get started. The first major era of Christian thought is often referred to as the “patristic period.” So what is meant by this? And what happened during this period? Let's find out.

THE PATRISTIC PERIOD, C.100–C.700

Christianity has its origins in Palestine – more specifically, the region of Judea, especially the city of Jerusalem – in the first century.

Christianity saw itself as a continuation and development of Judaism, and initially flourished in regions with which Judaism was traditionally associated, supremely Palestine itself. However, it rapidly spread to neighboring regions, partially through the efforts of early Christian evangelists such as Paul of Tarsus.

The Early Centers of Theological Activity

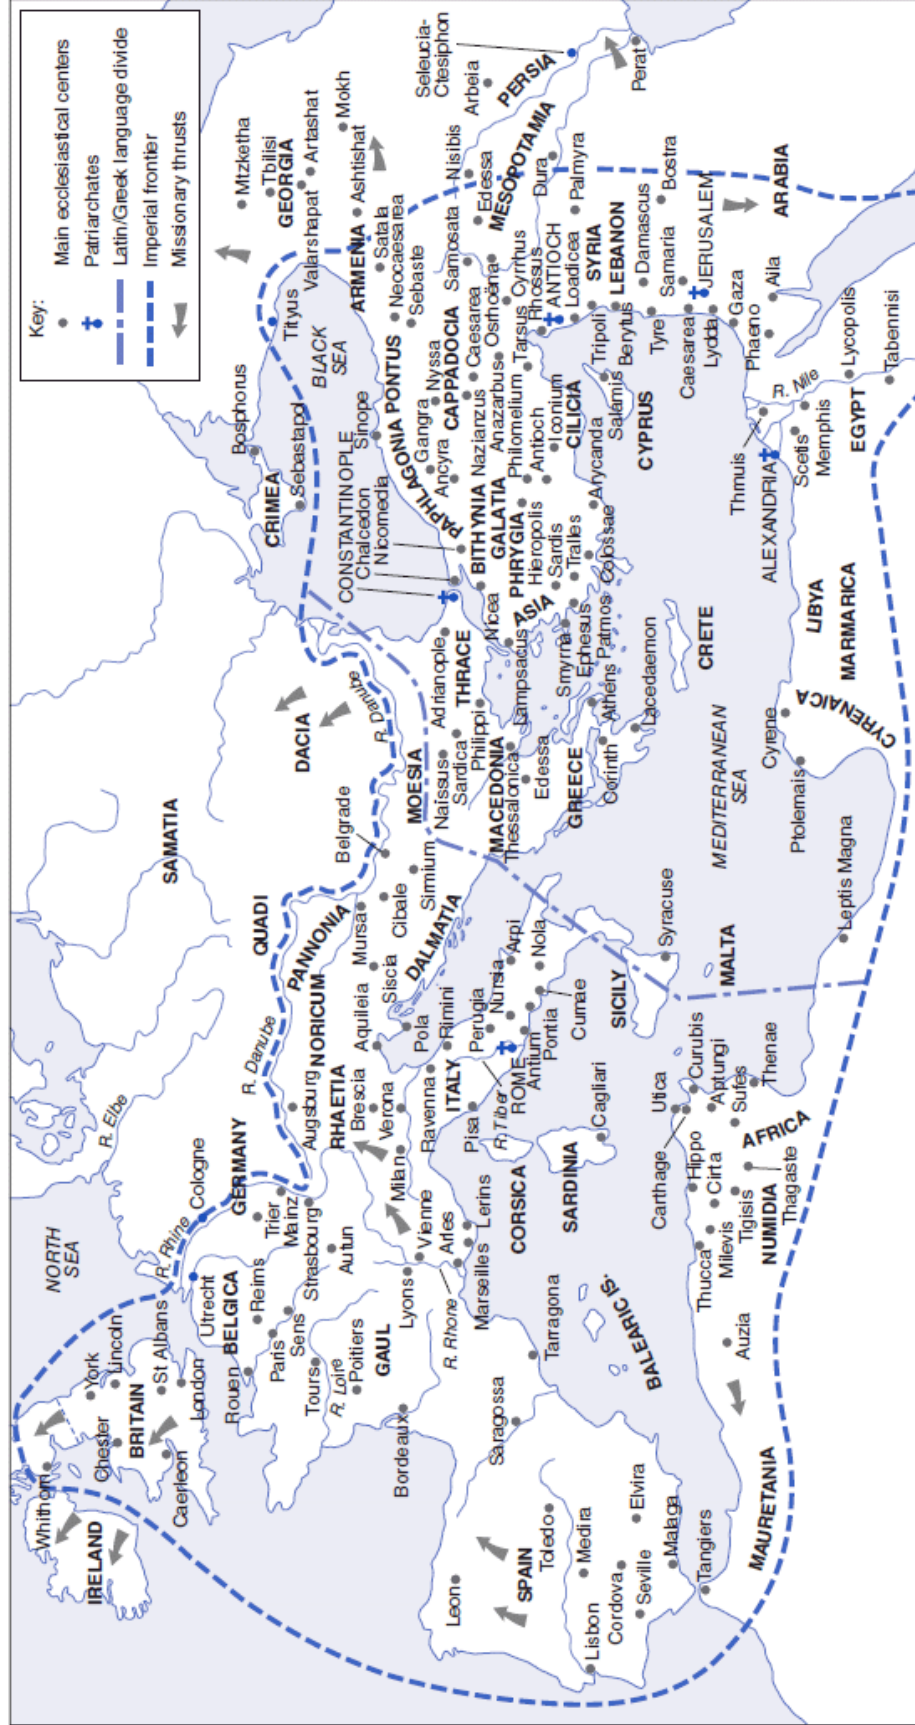

By the end of the first century AD, Christianity had become established throughout the eastern Mediterranean world and had even gained a significant presence in the city of Rome, the capital of the Roman empire. As the church at Rome became increasingly powerful, tensions began to develop between the Christian leadership at Rome and at the great cities of the eastern Roman empire, such as Alexandria and Antioch. By the fourth century, the Roman empire had effectively split in two. The western empire was now ruled from Rome, and the eastern from the great new imperial city of Constantinople. This foreshadowed the later schism between the western and eastern churches, centered on these respective seats of power.

In the course of this expansion, a number of regions emerged as significant centers of theological debate. Three may be singled out as having especial importance, the first two of which were Greek-speaking and the third Latin-speaking.

1. The city of Alexandria, in modern-day Egypt, which emerged as a center of Christian theological education. A distinctive style of theology came to be associated with this city, reflecting its long- standing association with the Platonic tradition. The student will find reference to “Alexandrian” approaches in areas such as Christology (the area of theology dealing with the identity and significance of Jesus Christ) and biblical interpretation (see pp. 115–16, 220–1), reflecting both the importance and the distinctiveness of the style of Christianity associated with the area.

2. The city of Antioch and the surrounding region of Cappadocia, in modern-day Turkey. A strong Christian presence came to be established in this northern region of the eastern Mediterranean at an early stage. Some of Paul's missionary journeys took him into this region, and Antioch features significantly at several points in the history of the very early church, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. Antioch itself soon became a leading center of Christian thought. Like Alexandria, it became associated with particular approaches to Christology and biblical interpretation. The term “Antiochene” is often used to designate this distinct theological style (see pp. 115–16, 200–1). The “Cappadocian fathers” were also an important theological presence in this region in the fourth century, notable especially for their contribution to the doctrine of the Trinity.
3. Western North Africa, especially the areas of modern-day Algeria and Tunisia. In the classical period, this was the site of Carthage, a major Mediterranean city and at one time a political rival to Rome for dominance in the region. During the period when Christianity expanded in this region, it was a Roman colony. Major writers of the region include Tertullian (c.160–c.220), Cyprian of Carthage (died 258), and Augustine of Hippo (354–430).

With the passing of time, some other cities around the Mediterranean – such as Rome, Constantinople, Milan, and Jerusalem – also became significant centers of Christian life and thought.

An Overview of the Patristic Period

The patristic period was one of the most exciting and creative periods in the history of Christian thought. This period is also of importance for theological reasons. Every mainstream Christian body – including the Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Lutheran, and Reformed churches – regards the patristic period as a definitive landmark in the development of Christian doctrine. Each of these churches regards itself as continuing, extending, and, where necessary, criticizing the views of the early church writers. For example, the leading seventeenth-century Anglican writer Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626) declared that mainstream Christianity was based upon one canon, two testaments, three creeds, four “general councils,” and the first five centuries of Christian history.

A Clarification of Terms

The term “patristic” comes from the Latin word pater, “father,” and designates both the period of the church fathers and the distinctive ideas that came to develop within this period. The term is noninclusive; no generally acceptable inclusive term has yet to emerge in the literature. For this reason, some prefer to talk about “early church theologians” rather than “patristic theologians.” We shall retain the term “patristic” in this work, as it is still widely used to refer to the theology of this formative period. The following related terms are still frequently encountered, and should be noted.

- The patristic period: This is a vaguely defined entity, often taken to be the period from the closing of the New Testament writings (c.100) to the definitive Council of Chalcedon (451).
- Patristics: This term is usually understood to mean the branch of theological study which deals with the study of “the fathers” (patres).
- Patrology: This term once literally meant “the study of the fathers,” in much the same way as “theology” meant “the study of God” (theos). In recent years, however, the word has shifted its meaning. It now refers to a manual of patristic literature, such as that of the noted German scholar Johannes Quasten (1900–87), which allows its readers easy access to the leading ideas of patristic writers and to some of the problems of interpretation associated with them.

The Theological Agenda of the Period

The patristic period was of major importance in clarifying a number of issues. One issue that had to be sorted out at an early stage was the relationship between Christianity and Judaism. The letters of Paul in the New Testament point to the importance of this question in the first century of Christian history, as a series of doctrinal and practical issues came under consideration. Since circumcision was obligatory for Jews, should Gentile (that is, non-Jewish) Christians be obliged to be circumcised? Did Christians have to observe Jewish food laws? And how was the Old Testament to be correctly interpreted?

However, other issues soon came to the fore. One which was of especial importance in the second century was that of apologetics – the reasoned defense and justification of the Christian faith against its critics. During the first period of Christian history, the church was often persecuted by the state and people were forced to worship secretly, often in private homes. Apologists such as Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165) tried to explain and defend the beliefs and practices of Christianity to a hostile pagan public. Although this early period produced some outstanding theologians – such as Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202) in the west and Origen (c.185–c.254) in the east – serious theological debate really began once the church had ceased to be persecuted.

These conditions became possible during the fourth century, with the conversion of Constantine (272–337; reigned 306–37), who went on to become Roman emperor. During his period as emperor (306–37), Constantine succeeded in reconciling church and empire, with the result that the church no longer existed under a siege mentality. In 321, he decreed that Sundays should become public holidays. As a result of Constantine's influence on the empire, constructive theological debate became a public affair. Apart from a brief period of uncertainty during the reign of Julian the Apostate (330–63; reigned 361–3), the church could now count upon the support of the state.

Theology now emerged from the hidden world of secret church meetings to become a matter of public interest and concern throughout the Roman empire. Increasingly, doctrinal debates became a matter of both political and theological importance. Constantine wished to have a united church throughout his empire, and was thus concerned that doctrinal differences should be debated and settled as a matter of priority. One of the most important outcomes of this was the convening of the Council of Nicea (325) to resolve potentially divisive debates within the church over the best way of express the identity and significance of Jesus Christ.

As a result, the later patristic period (from about 310 to 451) may be regarded as a high-water mark in the history of Christian theology. Theologians now enjoyed the freedom to work without the threat of persecution and were able to address a series of issues of major importance to the consolidation of the emerging theological consensus within the churches. Establishing that consensus involved extensive debate and a painful learning process, in which the church discovered that it had to come to terms with disagreements and continuing tensions. Nonetheless, a significant degree of consensus, eventually to be enshrined in the ecumenical creeds, can be discerned as evolving within this formative period.

The patristic period is obviously of considerable importance to Christian theology. It is, however, found to be very difficult by many modern students of theology. There are four main reasons for this.

1. Some of the debates of the period seem hopelessly irrelevant to the modern world. They were viewed as intensely important at the time, but it is often very difficult for the modern reader to empathize with the issues and to understand why they attracted such attention. It is interesting to contrast the patristic period in this respect with the Reformation era, during which many issues were addressed which are of continuing concern for the modern church. Many teachers of theology find that their students are able to relate to the concerns of this later period much more easily.
2. Many of the patristic debates hinge upon technical philosophical questions and only make sense if the reader has some familiarity with the philosophical debates of the period. Whereas at least some students of Christian theology have some familiarity with the ideas found in Plato's dialogues, these ideas were subject to considerable development and criticism in the Mediterranean world during the patristic period. Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism differ significantly from one another, and from Plato's original ideas. The strangeness of many of the philosophical ideas of this period makes it difficult for students beginning in theology to fully appreciate what is going on in some of the patristic debates.

3. The patristic period was an age of flux, during which landmarks and standards – including documents such as the Nicene Creed and dogmas such as the two natures of Christ – emerged gradually. The fixing of the canon of Scripture, of major importance to theological debates, dates from the fourth century. Students familiar with the relative stability of Christian doctrine in other periods (such as the Reformation, in which the person of Christ was not a major issue) often find this feature of the patristic period disconcerting.
4. The period saw a major division arise, for both political and linguistic reasons, between the eastern Greek-speaking and the western Latin-speaking churches. Many scholars discern a marked difference in theological temperament between theologians of the east and west: the former are often philosophically inclined and given to theological speculation, whereas the latter are often hostile to the intrusion of philosophy into theology and regard theology as the exploration of the doctrines set out in Scripture.

Key Theologians

During the course of this work, we will refer regularly to a number of significant theologians from the patristic period. The following patristic writers are of especial importance and deserve to be singled out for special mention.

Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165)

Justin is perhaps the greatest of the apologists – the Christian writers of the second century who were concerned to defend Christianity in the face of intense criticism from pagan sources. Though born in Palestine, Justin eventually settled in Rome, where he gained a reputation as a Christian teacher. In his “First Apology,” Justin argued that traces of Christian truth were to be found in the great pagan writers. His doctrine of the logos spermatikos (“seed-bearing word”) allowed him to affirm that God had prepared the way for his final revelation in Christ through hints of its truth in classical philosophy. Justin provides us with an important early example of a theologian who attempts to relate the gospel to the outlook of Greek philosophy, a trend especially associated with the eastern church.

Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202)

Irenaeus is believed to have been born in Smyrna (in modern-day Turkey), although he subsequently settled in Rome. He became bishop of Lyons around 178, a position which he held until his death two decades later. Irenaeus is noted especially for his vigorous defense of Christian orthodoxy in the face of a challenge from Gnosticism (see p. 196). His most significant work, “Against Heresies,” represents a major defense of the Christian understanding of salvation, and especially of the role of tradition in remaining faithful to the apostolic witness in the face of non-Christian interpretations.

Tertullian (c.160–c.220)

Tertullian was originally a pagan from the North African city of Carthage, and converted to Christianity in his thirties. He is often regarded as the father of Latin theology on account of the major impact he had upon the western church. He defended the unity of the Old and New Testaments against Marcion of Sinope (c.85–160), who had argued that they related to different gods. In doing so, he laid the foundations for a doctrine of the Trinity. Tertullian was strongly opposed to making Christian theology or apologetics dependent upon nonbiblical sources. He was among the most forceful early exponents of the principle of the sufficiency of Scripture, denouncing those who appealed to secular philosophies (such as those of the Athenian Academy) for a true knowledge of God.

Origen (c.185–c.254)

Origen, who was based in the great city of Alexandria, was one of the most significant defenders of Christianity in the third century. His theology provided an important foundation for the development of eastern Christian thought. Origen's major contributions to the development of Christian theology can be seen in two general areas. In the field of biblical interpretation, Origen developed the notion of allegorical interpretation, arguing that the surface meaning of Scripture was to be distinguished from its deeper spiritual meaning. In the field of Christology, Origen established a tradition of distinguishing between the full divinity of the Father and a lesser divinity of the Son. Some scholars see Arianism as a natural consequence of this approach. Origen also adopted with some enthusiasm the idea of “apocatastasis,” according to which every creature – including both humanity and Satan – will be saved.

Cyprian of Carthage (Died 258)

Little is known of Cyprian's early life. He was born, probably around the year 200, to pagan Roman parents in North Africa. He went on to become a prominent lawyer and rhetorician of considerable skill. He converted to Christianity around 246 and was elected bishop of the major North African city of Carthage in 248. He was martyred in that city during the Decian persecution of 258. His major essay On the Unity of the Catholic Church stresses the importance of visible, concrete unity among Christians and the role of the bishops in guaranteeing that unity. It is widely regarded as a landmark in the development of Christian understandings of the nature of the church.

Athanasius (c.293–373)

Athanasius's significance relates primarily to Christological issues, which became of major importance during the fourth century. Possibly while still in his twenties, Athanasius wrote the treatise On the Incarnation of the Word. This was a powerful defense of the idea of the incarnation – namely, the belief that God assumed human nature in the person of Jesus Christ. This issue proved to be of central importance in the Arian controversy (see pp. 217–19), to which Athanasius made a major contribution. Athanasius pointed out that if, as Arius (c.260–c.336) argued, Christ was not fully God, a series of devastating implications followed. First, it was impossible for God to redeem humanity, as no creature could redeem another creature. And, second, it followed that the Christian church was guilty of idolatry, as Christians regularly worshiped and prayed to Christ. As “idolatry” can be defined as “worship of a human construction or creation,” it followed that this worship was idolatrous. Such arguments eventually carried the day, and led to the rejection of Arianism.

The Cappadocian Fathers

This term is widely used in theological literature to refer to three major theologians (two brothers and their close friend) of the Greek-speaking church, based in the region of Cappadocia, now in modern-day Turkey. The three “Cappadocian fathers” are:

1. Basil the Great (c.330–79), bishop of Caesarea, also known as Basil of Caesarea and the older brother of Gregory of Nyssa;
2. Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394), bishop of Nyssa and younger brother of Basil the Great;
3. Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89), bishop of Sasima and later of Constantinople.

Each of these writers is of considerable importance in their own right. However, they collectively made an immense contribution to the development of the doctrine of the Trinity during the fourth century. By emphasizing the idea of “substance” (hypostasis), they were able to formulate a stable and relatively coherent concept of the Godhead, consisting of one substance and three persons.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430)

Aurelius Augustinus, usually known as Augustine of Hippo, is probably the greatest and most influential mind of the Christian church throughout its long history. Attracted to the Christian faith by the preaching of Bishop Ambrose of Milan (c.337–97), Augustine underwent a dramatic conversion experience in a garden in Milan.

Augustine left Italy to return to North Africa, and was made bishop of Hippo (in modern-day Algeria) in 395. The remaining 35 years of his life witnessed numerous controversies of major importance to the future of the Christian church in the west, and Augustine's contribution to the resolution of each of these was decisive. His careful exposition of the New Testament, particularly the letters of Paul, gained him a reputation, which continues today, as the “second founder of the Christian faith” (Jerome). During the theological renaissance of the early Middle Ages, Augustine's substantial body of writings would form the basis of a major program of renewal and development, consolidating his influence over the western church.

A major part of Augustine's contribution lies in the development of theology as an academic discipline. The early church cannot really be said to have developed any “systematic theology.” Its primary concern was to defend Christianity against its critics (as in the apologetic works of Justin Martyr) and to clarify central aspects of its thinking against heresy (as in the anti-Gnostic writings of Irenaeus). Nevertheless, major doctrinal development took place during the first four centuries, especially in relation to the doctrine of the person of Christ and the doctrine of the Trinity.

Augustine's contribution was to achieve a synthesis of Christian thought, supremely in his major treatise The City of God. Like Charles Dickens's famous novel, Augustine's City of God is a tale of two cities – the city of the world and the city of God (see p. 429).

However, in addition, it may be argued that Augustine made key contributions to three major areas of Christian theology: the doctrine of the church and sacraments, arising from the Donatist controversy (see pp. 358–60); the doctrine of grace, arising from the Pelagian controversy (see pp. 330–4); and the doctrine of the Trinity (see pp. 312–13). Interestingly, Augustine never really explored the area of Christology, which would unquestionably have benefited from his considerable wisdom and acumen.

Key Theological Debates and Developments

As we have already noted, the patristic period was of immense importance in shaping the contours of Christian theology. The following areas of theology were explored with particular vigor during the patristic period.

The Extent of the New Testament Canon

From its outset, Christian theology recognized itself to be grounded in Scripture. There was, however, some uncertainty as to what the term “Scripture” actually designated. The patristic period witnessed a process of decision-making, in which limits were laid down to the New Testament – a process usually known as “the fixing of the canon.” The word “canon” needs explanation. It derives from the Greek word kanon meaning “a rule” or “a fixed reference point.” The “canon of Scripture” refers to a limited and defined group of writings that are accepted as authoritative within the Christian church. The term “canonical” is used to refer to scriptural writings accepted to be within the canon. Thus, the gospel of Luke is referred to as “canonical” whereas the gospel of Thomas is described as “extracanonical” (that is, lying outside the canon of Scripture).

For the writers of the New Testament, the term “Scripture” meant primarily a writing of the Old Testament. However, within a short period, early Christian writers (such as Justin Martyr) were referring to the “New Testament” (to be distinguished from the “Old Testament”) and insisting that both collections of works were to be treated with equal authority. By the time of Irenaeus, it was generally accepted that there were four gospels; by the late second century, there was a consensus that the gospels, Acts, and letters had the status of inspired Scripture. Thus, Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215) recognized four gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, 14 letters of Paul (the letter to the Hebrews being regarded as Pauline), and Revelation. Tertullian declared that the “evangelical and apostolic writings” were to be read alongside the “law and the prophets,” both of which were authoritative within the church. Gradually, agreement was reached over the list of books which were recognized as inspired Scripture and the order in which they were to be arranged. In 367, Athanasius circulated his 39th Festal Letter, which identifies the 27 canonical books of the New Testament, as we now know it.

Debate centered especially on a number of books. The western church had hesitations about including Hebrews as it was not specifically attributed to an apostle; the eastern church had reservations about the book of Revelation (sometimes referred to as the “Apocalypse”). Four of the smaller books (2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude) were often omitted from early lists of New Testament writings. Some writings, now outside the canon, were regarded with favor in parts of the church, although they ultimately failed to gain universal acceptance as canonical. Examples of this include the first letter of Clement (an early bishop of Rome, who wrote around 96) and the Didache, a short early Christian manual on morals and church practices, probably dating from the first quarter of the second century. Yet, despite these local variations, agreement on the canon appears to have emerged remarkably quickly within the Christian world.

The arrangement of the material within the canon was also subject to discussion. Which books should appear first? How should the letters be arranged? And where did the Acts of the Apostles fit in? Agreement was reached at an early stage that the gospels should have the place of honor within the canon, followed by the Acts of the Apostles. The eastern church tended to place the seven “catholic letters” (that is, James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, and Jude) before the 14 Pauline letters, whereas the western church placed Paul's letters immediately after Acts and followed them with the catholic letters. Revelation ended the canon in both east and west, although its status was subject to debate for some time within the eastern church.

What criteria were used in drawing up the canon? The basic principle appears to have been that of the recognition rather than the imposition of authority. In other words, the works in question were recognized as already possessing authority, rather than having an arbitrary authority imposed upon them. For Irenaeus, the church does not create the canon; it acknowledges, conserves, and receives canonical Scripture on the basis of the authority that is already inherent in it. Some early Christians appear to have regarded apostolic authorship as of decisive importance; others were prepared to accept books which did not appear to have apostolic credentials. However, although the precise details of how the selection was made remain unclear, it is certain that the canon was closed within the western church by the beginning of the fifth century. The issue of the canon would not be raised again until the time of the Reformation.

The Role of Tradition: The Gnostic Controversies

The early church was confronted with a major challenge from a movement known as Gnosticism. This diverse and complex movement, not dissimilar to the modern New Age phenomenon, achieved considerable influence in the late Roman empire. The basic ideas of Gnosticism do not concern us at this point; what is of relevance here is that Gnosticism appeared very similar to Christianity at many points. Gnostic writers often interpreted New Testament passages in a decidedly unorthodox way, raising important questions about the correct manner of interpretation of Scripture. For this reason, Gnosticism was viewed as a major challenge by many early Christian writers, especially Irenaeus.

In such a context, an appeal to tradition became of major importance. How did the first Christians interpret the Bible? The word “tradition” literally means “that which has been handed down or over,” although it can also refer to “the act of handing down or over.” Irenaeus insisted that the “rule of faith” (regula fidei) was faithfully preserved by the apostolic church, and that it had found its expression in the canonical books of Scripture. The church had faithfully proclaimed the same gospel from the time of the apostles until the present day. The Gnostics had no such claim to continuity with the early church. They had merely invented new ideas, and were improperly suggesting that these were “Christian.”

Irenaeus thus emphasized the continuity of the teaching and preaching office of the church and its officials (especially its bishops). Tradition came to mean “a traditional interpretation of Scripture” or “a traditional presentation of the Christian faith,” which is reflected in the creeds of the church and its public doctrinal pronouncements. This fixing of the creeds as a public expression of the teaching of the church is of major importance, as will become clear in the following section.

Tertullian adopted a related approach. Scripture, he argued, is capable of being understood clearly, provided that it is read as a whole. However, he conceded that controversy over the interpretation of certain passages was inevitable. Heretics, he observed gloomily, can make Scripture say more or less anything that they like. For this reason, the tradition of the church was of considerable importance, as it indicated the manner in which Scripture had been received and interpreted within the church. The right interpretation of Scripture was thus to be found where true Christian faith and discipline had been maintained. A similar view was taken by Athanasius, who argued that Arius's distorted account of the identity of Jesus Christ would never have arisen if he had remained faithful to the church's interpretation of Scripture.

Tradition was thus seen as a legacy from the apostles, by which the church was guided and directed toward a correct interpretation of Scripture. It was not seen as a “secret source of revelation” in addition to Scripture, an idea which Irenaeus dismissed as “Gnostic.” Rather, it was seen as a means of ensuring that the church remained faithful to the historic teaching of the apostles instead of adopting idiosyncratic interpretations of Scripture.

The Fixing of the Ecumenical Creeds

The English word “creed” derives from the Latin word credo, “I believe,” with which the Apostles' Creed – probably the most familiar of all the creeds – begins: “I believe in God.” The word “creed” has come to refer to a statement of faith summarizing the main points of Christian belief, common to all Christians. For this reason, the term “creed” is never applied to statements of faith associated with specific Protestant denominations. These latter are often referred to as “confessions” (such as the Lutheran Augsburg Confession or the Reformed Westminster Confession of Faith). A “confession” pertains to a denomination and includes specific beliefs and emphases relating to that denomination; a “creed” pertains to the entire Christian church and includes nothing more and nothing less than a statement of beliefs which every Christian ought to be able to accept and be bound by. A “creed” has come to be recognized as a concise, formal, and universally accepted and authorized statement of the main points of Christian faith.

The patristic period saw two creeds – known as the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed – winning increasing authority and respect throughout the church. The stimulus for their development appears to have been the growing need to provide a convenient summary of Christian faith suitable for important religious occasions, especially baptism. The early church often baptized its converts on Easter Day, using the period of Lent as a time of preparation and instruction for this moment of public declaration of faith and commitment. Each convert who wished to be baptized was required to declare his or her faith in public. Creeds began to be used as a uniform declaration of faith which converts could use on such occasions.

The Apostles' Creed is probably the most familiar form of the creed known to western Christians. It falls into three main sections, dealing with God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit. There is also material relating to the church, judgment, and resurrection. The historical evolution of this creed can be traced back to the declarations of faith which were required of those who wanted to be baptized. The 12 individual statements of this creed, which seems to have assumed its final form in the eighth century, are traditionally ascribed to individual apostles, although there is no historical justification for this belief. There are slight differences between the eastern and western versions of this creed. The statements concerning Christ's "descent into hell" and the "communion of saints" (printed below within square brackets) are not found in eastern versions of the work.

The Apostles' Creed

1. I believe in God, the Father almighty, creator of the heavens and earth;
2. and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord;
3. who was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary;
4. he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried;
[he descended to hell;]
5. on the third day he was raised from the dead;
6. he ascended into the heavens, and sits at the right hand of God the Father almighty;
7. from where he will come to judge the living and the dead.
8. I believe in the Holy Spirit;
9. in the holy catholic church; [the communion of saints;]
10. the forgiveness of sins;
11. the resurrection of the flesh;
12. 12 and eternal life.

The Nicene Creed is a longer version of the creed which includes additional material relating to the person of Christ and the work of the Holy Spirit. In response to the controversies concerning the divinity of Christ, this creed includes strong affirmations of his unity with God, including the expressions “God from God” and “of one substance with the Father.” This creed was developed with the Arian controversy over the divinity of Christ (see pp. 217–19) in mind. As part of its polemic against the Arians, the Council of Nicea (June 325) formulated a short statement of faith based on a baptismal creed used at Jerusalem. This was developed further at the First Council of Constantinople (381) and became known as the “Niceno–Constantinopolitan Creed.” Not surprisingly, this clumsy name was soon abbreviated to “Nicene Creed.”

The Nicene Creed was intended to affirm the full divinity of Christ against the Arian understanding of his creaturely status, and includes four explicit condemnations of Arian views, as well as its three articles of faith. As the full details of the proceedings of Nicea are now lost, we are obliged to rely on secondary sources (such as ecclesiastical historians and writers such as Athanasius and Basil of Caesarea) for the text of this creed.

The Nicene Creed

We believe in one God, the Father, the almighty, the maker of all things seen and unseen. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God; begotten from the Father; only-begotten – that is, from the substance of the Father; God from God; light from light; true God from true God; begotten not made; of one substance with the Father; through whom all things in heaven and on earth came into being; who on account of us human beings and our salvation came down and took flesh, becoming a human being; he suffered and rose again on the third day, ascended into the heavens; and will come again to judge the living and the dead. And in the Holy Spirit.

As for those who say that “there was when he was not,” and “before being born he was not,” and “he came into existence out of nothing,” or who declare that the Son of God is of a different substance or nature, or is subject to alteration or change – the catholic and apostolic church condemns these.

The development of the creeds was an important element in the move toward achieving a doctrinal consensus within the early church. One area of doctrine which witnessed considerable development and controversy related to the person of Christ, to which we now turn.

The Two Natures of Jesus Christ: The Arian Controversy

The two doctrines to which the patristic period may be argued to have made a decisive contribution relate to the person of Christ (an area of theology which, as we noted, is generally designated “Christology”) and the nature of the Godhead. These two developments are organically related to one another. By 325, the early church had come to the conclusion that the significance of Christ was best understood as being “of one substance” (homoousios) with God. (The term homoousios can also be translated as “one in being” or “consubstantial.”)

This Christological statement can be seen as consolidating at the intellectual level the church's understanding of the spiritual importance of Jesus Christ to Christians. However, it posed a powerful challenge to simplistic conceptions of God. If Jesus Christ is recognized as “being of the same substance” as God, the entire doctrine of God has to be reconsidered and reworked in the light of this belief. For this reason, the historical development of the doctrine of the Trinity dates from after the emergence of a Christological consensus within the church. Only when the divinity of Christ could be treated as an agreed and assured starting point could theological speculation on the nature of God begin.

The Christological debates of the early church took place largely in the eastern Mediterranean world and were conducted in the Greek language, often in the light of the presuppositions of major Greek schools of philosophy. In practical terms, this means that many of the central terms of the Christological debates of the early church are Greek, often with a history of use within the Greek philosophical tradition.

The main features of patristic Christology will be considered in some detail on pp. 214–24, to which the reader is referred. At this early stage, however, we may summarize the main landmarks of the patristic Christological debate in terms of two schools, two debates, and two “general councils,” as follows.

Schools

The Alexandrian school tended to emphasize the divinity of Christ and to interpret that divinity in terms of “the word becoming incarnate.” A scriptural text which was of central importance to this school is John 1: 14, “the word became flesh, and dwelt among us.” This emphasis upon the idea of incarnation led to the festival of Christmas being seen as especially important. The Antiochene school, however, placed a corresponding emphasis on the humanity of Christ, and attached especial importance to his moral example (see pp. 221–3).

Debates

The Arian controversy of the fourth century is widely regarded as one of the most significant in the history of the Christian church. Arius argued that those scriptural titles for Christ that appeared to point to his being of equal status with God were merely courtesy titles. Christ was to be regarded as a creature, although nevertheless as preeminent among other creatures.

This provoked a hostile response from Athanasius, who argued that the divinity of Christ was central to the Christian understanding of salvation (an area of theology known as “soteriology”). Arius's Christology was, he declared, inadequate soteriologically. Arius's Christ could not redeem fallen humanity. In the end, Arianism (the movement associated with Arius) was declared to be heretical.

This led into the Apollinarian debate, which centered on Apollinarius of Laodicea (c.310–c.390). This debate focused on the question of whether Christ was fully or partly human. A vigorous opponent of Arius, Apollinarius argued that Christ could not be regarded as being totally human. In Christ's case, the human spirit was replaced by the divine logos (“word” or “discourse”). As a result, Christ did not possess full humanity. This position was regarded as severely deficient by writers such as Gregory of Nazianzus as it implied that Christ could not fully redeem human nature (see p. 221).

General Councils

The Council of Nicea (325) was convened by Constantine, the first Christian emperor, with a view to sorting out the destabilizing Christological disagreements within his empire. Constantine realized that the unity of the church was essential to the stability of the empire, and wanted to establish peace within the church over the issue of the identity of Christ. He summoned a gathering of Christian leaders from all over the empire at Nicea (now the city of Iznik in modern-day Turkey). The word “synod” (from the Greek synodos, “a gathering together”) is often used to refer to these councils.

Nicea was the first “ecumenical council” (that is, a general assembly of bishops drawn from the entire Christian world; the decisions of these early bishops are still regarded as normative for the churches). These councils played an important role in clarifying and stabilizing doctrines in the first five centuries of Christian thought.

Nicea settled the Arian controversy by affirming that Jesus was homoousios (“one in being” or “of one substance”) with the Father, thus rejecting the Arian position in favor of a vigorous assertion of the divinity of Christ. The Council of Chalcedon (451), the fourth ecumenical council, confirmed the decisions of Nicea and responded to new debates which had subsequently erupted over the humanity of Christ.

The Doctrine of the Trinity

Once the Christological debates of the early church had been settled, the consequences of those decisions were explored. In this intensely creative and interesting period of Christian theology, the doctrine of the Trinity began to emerge in a recognizable form. The basic feature of this doctrine is that there are three persons within the Godhead – Father, Son, and Holy Spirit – and that these are to be regarded as equally divine and of equal status. The coequality of Father and Son was established through the Christological debates leading up to the Council of Nicea; the divinity of the Spirit was established in the aftermath of this, especially through the writings of Athanasius and Basil of Caesarea.

The main trinitarian debates increasingly came to focus on the way in which the Trinity was to be understood, rather than its fundamental validity. Two quite distinct approaches gradually emerged, one associated with the eastern church and the other with the western church.

The eastern position, which continues to be of major importance within the Greek and Russian Orthodox churches of today, was developed especially by a group of three writers, based in modern-day Turkey, known collectively as the “Cappadocian fathers.” Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory of Nazianzus began their reflections on the Trinity by considering the various ways in which the Father, Son, and Spirit are experienced. The western position, especially associated with Augustine of Hippo, began from the unity of God and proceeded to explore the implications of the love of God for our understanding of the nature of the Godhead. These positions will be explored in greater detail at the appropriate point in this work (see pp. 311–13).

The doctrine of the Trinity represents a rare instance of a theological issue of concern to both the eastern and western churches. Our attention now shifts to two theological debates which were specifically linked with the western church and have both come to be particularly associated with Augustine of Hippo.

The Doctrine of the Church: The Donatist Controversy

A major controversy within the western church centered on the question of the holiness of the church. The Donatists were a group of native African Christians, based in modern-day Algeria, who resented the growing influence of the Roman church in northern Africa. For reasons we shall explore in a moment, the Donatists took an increasingly hard line about church membership. They argued that the church was a body of saints within which sinners had no place.

The issue became of heightened importance on account of the persecution undertaken by the emperor Diocletian (244–311; reigned 284–305) in 303, which persisted until the conversion of Constantine in 313. During this persecution, in which the possession of Scripture was illegal, a number of Christians handed their copies of Scripture in to the authorities. They were immediately condemned by others who had refused to cave in to such pressure. After the persecution died down, many of these traditores – a Latin word which literally means “those who handed over [their Scriptures]” – rejoined the church. The Donatists demanded their exclusion; they had compromised themselves.

Augustine argued otherwise, declaring that the church must expect to remain a “mixed body” of saints and sinners, refusing to weed out those who had lapsed under persecution or for other reasons. The validity of the church's ministry and preaching did not depend upon the holiness of its ministers but upon the person of Jesus Christ. The personal unworthiness of a minister did not compromise the validity of the sacraments. This view, which rapidly became normative within the church, has had a deep impact upon Christian thinking about the nature of the church and its ministers.

The Donatist debate, which will be explored in greater detail elsewhere (see pp. 358–60), was the first to center explicitly on the question of the doctrine of the church (known as “ecclesiology”) and on related questions, such as the way in which sacraments function. Many of the issues raised by the controversy would surface again at the time of the Reformation, when ecclesiological issues would once more come to the fore (see pp. 360–4). The same may be said of the doctrine of grace, to which we now turn.

The Doctrine of Grace: The Pelagian Controversy

The doctrine of grace had not been an issue of significance in the development of theology in the Greek-speaking eastern church. However, an intense controversy broke out over this question in the second decade of the fifth century. Pelagius (c.354–c.420), a British ascetic monk based at Rome, argued forcefully for the need for human moral responsibility. Alarmed at the moral laxity of the Roman church, he insisted upon the need for constant self-improvement, in the light of the Old Testament law and the example of Christ. Pelagianism, a composite movement drawing on the ideas of Pelagius and his circle, came to be seen as a religion of human autonomy which held that human beings are able to take the initiative in their own salvation.

Augustine reacted forcefully against Pelagianism, insisting upon the priority of the grace of God at every stage in the Christian life, from its beginning to its end. Human beings did not, according to Augustine, possess the necessary freedom to take the initial steps toward salvation. Far from possessing “freedom of the will,” humans were in possession of a will that was corrupted and tainted by sin, and which biased them toward evil and away from God. Only the grace of God could counteract this bias toward sin. So forceful was Augustine's defense of grace that he later became known as “the doctor of grace.”

Questions for Chapter 1

As this is the first chapter of this work that many students will read, two sets of questions are provided. Those in the first group are elementary; the second are pitched at the level found throughout the remainder of this book.

Set 1: Introductory

1. Locate the following cities or regions on Map 1.1 (p. 6): Alexandria, Antioch, Cappadocia, Constantinople, Hippo, Jerusalem, Rome.
2. Now find the Latin/Greek dividing line on the same map. Latin was the main language west of that line and Greek the main language east of it. Identify the predominant language in each of the cities mentioned in question 1.
3. Which language would you associate with each of the following writers: Athanasius, Augustine of Hippo, Origen, Tertullian?
4. The following movements were of major importance during the patristic period: Arianism, Donatism, Gnosticism, Pelagianism. Associate the controversies centering on each of these movements with one of the following theologians: Athanasius, Augustine of Hippo, Irenaeus of Lyons. (Note that one of these theologians is associated with more than one controversy.)

Set 2: Standard Level

1. What was the main issue debated during the Arian controversy? Why did Arius's opponents regard this as being of such importance?
2. Why was the introduction of fixed creeds widely regarded as a welcome development by many within the churches?

3. Why was it important to reach agreement on the canon of Scripture? What practical difference would this have made to theological debate at the time?
4. The English historian Thomas Carlyle once suggested that history was basically the biography of great individuals. On the basis of your reading of this chapter, who do you think was the most significant person in relation to the shaping of Christian theology over this period?
5. Why was there relatively little interest in the doctrine of the church in this early period? And why do you think the Donatist controversy broke out in the western, rather than the eastern, church?

THE MIDDLE AGES AND THE RENAISSANCE, C.700–C.1500

With the collapse and gradual disintegration of the western Roman empire in the fifth century, the face of western Europe began to change. A patchwork of regions and city-states began to emerge, each in fierce competition for territory and influence. Yet, during this period of fragmentation, the Christian church gradually began to develop a political and temporal role that placed it at the heart of western culture. As some degree of political and economic stability emerged around the year 1100, the church was poised to exercise a major role in shaping the culture of the Middle Ages.

The expansion of Islam around the Mediterranean in the seventh century led to widespread political destabilization and further structural changes in the region. By the eleventh century, however, a degree of stability had emerged within this area, as three major power groupings emerged to take the place of the former Roman empire.

1. Byzantium, centered on the city of Constantinople (now Istanbul, in modern-day Turkey). The form of Christianity that predominated in this region was based on the Greek language and was deeply rooted in the writings of patristic scholars of the eastern Mediterranean region, such as Athanasius (c.293–373), the Cappadocian fathers, and John of Damascus (c.676–749). A discussion of some distinctive themes of Byzantine theology may be found on pp. 27–9.
2. Western Europe, mainly regions such as those now known as France, Germany, the Low Countries, and northern Italy. The form of Christianity that came to dominate this region was centered on the city of Rome and its bishop, known as “the pope.”

(However, during the period known as the “Great Schism,” some confusion developed: there were two rival claimants for the papacy, one based at Rome, the other at the southern French city of Avignon.) In this region, theology came to be concentrated in the great cathedral and university schools of Paris and elsewhere, based largely on the Latin writings of Augustine (354–430), Ambrose of Milan (c.337–97), and Hilary of Poitiers (c.300–68).

3. The Caliphate, an Islamic region embracing much of the extreme eastern and southern parts of the Mediterranean. The expansion of Islam continued, with the fall of Constantinople in 1453 sending shock waves throughout much of western Europe. By the end of the fifteenth century, Islam had established a significant presence in two regions of the continent of Europe: Spain and the Balkans. This advance was eventually halted by the defeat of the Moors in Spain in the final decade of the fifteenth century, and the defeat of Islamic armies outside Vienna in 1523.

The Middle Ages represented an immensely creative and innovative period in Christian theology. The courts, the monasteries, and later the universities of Europe became centers of excellence for theological reflection, where new approaches to the relation of Christian thought and life were developed. The period was given an added injection of vitality through the rise of the Renaissance in western Europe. This dynamic cultural program aimed to reinvigorate the life and thought of the church and society as a whole through the creative reappropriation of the classical past. As so many theological landmarks date from this period, it is important to identify and reflect on its achievements and contributions to the theological agenda. But first, we must reflect on some problems of definition.

On Defining the “Middle Ages”

It is always difficult to be precise about when one era ends and another begins. Traditionally, accounts of the development of Christian theology proceed directly from the close of the patristic period, marked by the Council of Chalcedon (451), to the great theological renaissance in western Europe during the Middle Ages. This is unsatisfactory for many reasons. The most obvious of these is that the “Middle Ages” was a cultural development that was specific to western Europe. This traditional account also overlooks the fact that the Roman empire in the east was relatively unaffected by the fall of Rome in 410. While the western Roman empire fragmented, giving rise to social and political instability in much of western Europe, the eastern empire remained in place for a further thousand years. The development of Byzantine theology does not easily fit the categories of western European history. It also overlooks earlier renewals in Christian theology in the west – for example, the important developments that took place during the reign of Charlemagne (747?–814, reigned 800–14), the first Holy Roman Emperor.

One of the most important developments in the history of Christianity during this period was the “Great Schism.” For a variety of reasons, relations between the eastern church, based at Constantinople, and the western church, based at Rome, became increasingly strained during the ninth and tenth centuries. Growing disagreement over a clause in the western version of the Nicene Creed (see pp. 287–90) was of no small importance in this increasingly sour atmosphere. The west spoke of the Holy Spirit “proceeding from the father and the son”; the east only of his “proceeding from the father.” (This debate is often referred to as the filioque controversy, from the Latin term meaning “and from the son.”) Other factors also contributed to these tensions, including the political rivalry between Latin-speaking Rome and Greek-speaking Constantinople, and the increasing claims to authority of the Roman pope. The final break between the Catholic west and the Orthodox east is usually dated to 1054, although this date is slightly arbitrary.

One major result of this tension was that there was little theological interaction between east and west. Although western theologians such as Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) felt free to draw on the writings of Greek fathers, these works tended to antedate this period. The works of later Orthodox theologians, such as the noted writer Gregory Palamas (c.1296–1357), attracted little attention in the west. It is only in the twentieth century that western theology may really be said to have begun to rediscover the riches of the Orthodox tradition.

The term “medieval theology” is often used to refer to western theology during this era, whereas the term “Byzantine theology” is used to refer to the theology of the eastern church over roughly the same period, prior to the fall of Constantinople in 1453. During this period in western European history, the centers of Christian theology gradually moved northward, to central France and Germany. Although Rome remained a center of Christian power in the region, intellectual activity gradually came to migrate to the monasteries of France, such as Bec, Chartres, and Reims. With the foundation of the medieval universities, theology rapidly established itself as a central area of academic study. A typical medieval university possessed four faculties: the lower faculty of arts and the three higher faculties of theology, medicine, and law. In what follows, we shall consider some of these developments in western Europe, before turning to consider developments in Byzantium.

Theological Landmarks in Western Europe

Historians have debated for some time the question of when the “Middle Ages” can be said to have begun. The answers given to this question depend, as might be expected, on matters of definition. The practically simultaneous suppression of the Athenian Platonic Academy and the establishment of the great monastery at Monte Cassino around the year 529 are regarded by many as marking, although not in themselves causing, the transition from late antiquity to the medieval period. For some, the medieval period is regarded as having been initiated through Alaric's (370–410) conquest of Rome in 410, with the resulting gradual shift in the centers of intellectual life from the Mediterranean world to the northern European world of Theodoric and Charlemagne, and later to the abbey and cathedral schools of France and the universities of Paris and Oxford. We may therefore begin our brief survey of the development of western medieval theology by considering the revival of its fortunes under the first Holy Roman Emperor, Charlemagne.

The Rise of Medieval Schools of Theology

Under Charlemagne, a concerted effort was directed toward renewing the life of the mind within the church. A series of imperial decrees established two kinds of theological schools throughout northern Europe: monastic schools (intended primarily for the instruction of those intending to proceed to monastic vocations) and cathedral schools (set up by the bishop for broader educational purposes). Monasteries and cathedrals became seats of learning and would retain this important role as centers of theological research and education until the rise of the universities in the thirteenth century.

The cathedral of Laon, northwest of Paris, became the site of a very significant school of theology under Anselm of Laon (died 1117), attracting scholars of the caliber of Peter Abelard (1079–1142) during its heyday. The Royal Abbey of St. Victor, founded in Paris in the twelfth century, became one of the most important centers of theological education and was of major importance in shaping the theological curriculum at the fledgling University of Paris. Among its twelfth-century luminaries we may note Hugh of St. Victor (c.1096–1141), Peter Lombard (c.1100–60), Andrew of St. Victor (died 1175), and Richard of St. Victor (died 1173).

The great convents of the Middle Ages provided bases from which women writers could exercise a significant influence on the thinking of the church. Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), abbess of Rupertsberg, established a reputation as a theological and spiritual writer of considerable originality. She is best known for her Book of Divine Works, written over the period 1163–73.

The rise in importance of these monastic and cathedral schools is associated with another development: the emergence of distinctive styles of theology, linked with specific religious orders. The Middle Ages witnessed the founding of several major new religious orders. In 1098, the Cistercian order was founded at Cîteaux, in the middle of the wild countryside around the River Saône. One of the most noted Cistercian leaders was the great spiritual writer and preacher Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153). It is estimated that, by the dawn of the fourteenth century, some six hundred Cistercian monasteries or convents had come into being.

Two other major orders were founded more than a century later: the Franciscans and Dominicans. The Franciscans were founded by Francis of Assisi (c.1181–1226), who renounced a life of wealth to live a life of prayer and poverty. He was joined by Clare of Assisi, formerly a noblewoman, who founded the order of “Poor Clares.” The Franciscans were often referred to as “Gray Friars” on account of the dark gray habits they wore. The order was distinguished by its emphasis on individual and corporate poverty.

The Dominicans (sometimes referred to as “Black Friars” on account of their black mantle worn over a white habit) were founded by the Spanish priest Dominic de Guzman (1170–1221), with a particular emphasis on education. By the end of the Middle Ages, the Dominicans had established houses in most major European cities and made a significant contribution to the intellectual life of the church.

From the standpoint of the development of theology, it is important to appreciate that distinct schools of theology came to be associated with monastic orders. Not all religious orders regarded academic theology as being of importance. The Cistercians, for example, placed a particular emphasis on spirituality, rather than more academic forms of theology. Three religious orders may be noted as having had a particularly significant impact on the shaping of medieval theology. In each case, a distinctive style of theology developed within the order and distinguished it from the others.

1. The Dominicans. The distinctive theological position of this order was developed by such major writers as Albert the Great (c.1200–80), Thomas Aquinas, and Peter of Tarantaise (1102–74).
2. The Franciscans. Three major theologians of the Middle Ages were associated with this order: Bonaventure (1221–74), Duns Scotus (1266–1308), and William of Ockham (c.1285–1347).
3. The Augustinians. The distinctive theological position of this order was developed initially by Giles of Rome (c.1243–1316) and subsequently by writers such as Thomas of Strasbourg (c.1275–1357).

The Founding of the Universities

The restoration of some degree of political stability in France in the late eleventh century encouraged the re-emergence of the University of Paris, which rapidly became recognized as the intellectual center of Europe. A number of theological “schools” were established on the Left Bank of the Seine, and on the Ile de la Cité, in the shadow of the newly built cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris.

One such school was the Collège de Sorbonne, which eventually achieved such fame that “the Sorbonne” came to be a shorthand way of referring to the University of Paris as a whole. Even in the sixteenth century, Paris was widely recognized as a leading center of theological and philosophical study, including among its students such prominent individuals as Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) and John Calvin (1509–64). Other such centers of study were soon established elsewhere in Europe. A new program of theological development began, concerned with consolidating the intellectual, legal, and spiritual aspects of the life of the Christian church.

The University of Paris soon established itself as a leading center of theological speculation, with such scholars as Peter Abelard, Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, and Bonaventure. Initially, the most significant rival to Paris was the University of Oxford, in England. However, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries witnessed a considerable expansion of the university sector in western Europe, with major new universities being founded in Germany and elsewhere.

A Theological Textbook: The Four Books of the Sentences

Theological education needs educators – and textbooks. The most influential textbook of the medieval period was Peter Lombard's Four Books of the Sentences, which was widely used for four hundred years. At some point around 1140, Peter Lombard began to teach at the University of Paris. One of his primary concerns was to get his students to wrestle with the thorny issues of theology. His contribution was his textbook. This work was basically a collection of quotations from Scripture and the patristic writers, arranged topically.

The task Peter set his students was simple: to construct a theology which was able to reconcile the various quotations he had assembled. The book proved to be of major importance in developing the Augustinian heritage, in that students were obliged to wrestle with the ideas of Augustine and reconcile apparently contradictory texts by devising suitable theological explanations for the inconsistencies (see p. 34).

By 1215 the work was firmly established as the most important textbook of the age. It became obligatory for theologians to study and comment on Lombard's work. The resulting writings, known as "Commentaries on the Sentences," became one of the most familiar theological genres of the Middle Ages. Outstanding examples include those of Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus. The work was still used in the sixteenth century, and was even annotated by Martin Luther (1483–1546).

"Cathedrals of the Mind": Scholasticism

Scholasticism derives its name from the great medieval schools (Latin: scholae) in which the classic questions of theology and philosophy were debated. It is best understood as the medieval theological movement, flourishing in the period 1200–1500, which placed emphasis upon the rational justification of religious belief and the systematic presentation of those beliefs. "Scholasticism" thus does not refer to a specific system of beliefs but to a particular way of doing and organizing theology. The comprehensiveness of scholastic theological systems led the French philosopher and historian of philosophy Étienne Gilson (1884–1978) to draw an analogy with the great cathedrals of the Middle Ages. Scholasticism, he declared, was a "cathedral of the mind," showing order, complexity, and beauty.

Scholasticism may be argued to have made major contributions in a number of key areas of Christian theology, especially in relation to the discussion of the role of reason and logic in theology. The writings of Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and William of Ockham – often singled out as the three most influential of all scholastic writers – made highly significant contributions to this area of theology, and have served as landmarks ever since. Pope Leo XIII (1810–1903) gave added weight to Aquinas's status in 1879, through his encyclical letter Aeterni Patris (“Eternal Father”), which endorsed Aquinas as a model for theological education and reflection.

The Italian Renaissance and the Rise of Humanism

The French term “Renaissance” is now universally used to designate the literary and artistic revival which took place primarily in Italy during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. A central theme of the Italian Renaissance was a return to the cultural glories of ancient Greece and Rome. The Latin slogan ad fontes (“back to the original sources”) was a pithy summary of the movement's aims – to bypass the Middle Ages and engage directly with the thought and culture of the classical age. The classical period was to be both a resource and a norm for the Renaissance. In art and architecture, as in the written and spoken word, antiquity was seen as a cultural resource which could be appropriated by the Renaissance.

The term “humanism” was widely used at the time to refer to this cultural program. Although the term “humanism” later came to designate a worldview which denies the existence or relevance of God, or which is committed to a purely secular outlook, this was certainly not what the word meant at the time of the Renaissance. Most humanists of the period were religious and were concerned with purifying and renewing Christianity, rather than eliminating it. This process of regeneration would take place by returning to the fountainheads of western thought.

The Renaissance had a major influence on Christian theology. The key to the future of the church did not lie in scholastic theology but in a direct engagement with the text of Scripture and the writings of the patristic period. The humanist program was about returning to the wellspring and source of modern western culture in the ancient world, allowing these classical ideas and values to refresh and renew that culture. Christian humanists argued for a return to the simplicities of the New Testament, bypassing the complex theological programs of the Middle Ages. But this renewal of Christian theology would be on the basis of the original Greek text of the New Testament, not the medieval Vulgate Latin translation.

The Vulgate was a Latin translation of the Bible widely used in the Middle Ages. The Renaissance led to a demand for theologians to be competent in Hebrew and Greek, not merely Latin. One of the most significant theological developments associated with the rise of humanism is the increased questioning of the reliability of the Vulgate text. If this translation proved unreliable, in the light of an increased understanding of the Greek and Hebrew languages and an increased recognition of the importance of studying the Bible in those original languages, what of the theological ideas that might be dependent on such faulty translations? We shall return to this point later in this chapter (pp. 36–7).

Having thus far concentrated on western Europe, we must now turn to consider some of the important developments that took place in eastern Europe during this period.

Byzantine Theology: Major Themes

The distinctive theology of the eastern, Greek-speaking church during the Middle Ages is often known as “Byzantine theology.” The name is derived from the Greek city of Byzantium, which Constantine (272–337; reigned 306–37) chose as the site of his new capital city for the eastern Roman empire in 330. At this point, it was renamed Constantinople (“city of Constantine”). However, the name of the older town remained and gave its name to the distinctive style of theology that flourished in this region until the fall of Constantinople to invading Islamic armies in 1453.

During the time of the emperor Justinian (483–565; reigned 527–65), Byzantine theology began to emerge as an intellectual force of some considerable importance. As the eastern and western churches became increasingly alienated from each other (a process which began long before the final schism of 1054), so Byzantine thinkers often emphasized their divergence from western theology (e.g., in relation to the filioque clause: see p. 287), thus reinforcing the distinctiveness of their approach through polemical writings. For example, Byzantine writers tended to understand salvation primarily in terms of deification, rather than western legal or relational categories. In addition, they found themselves puzzled by the doctrines of purgatory which were gaining the ascendancy in western Catholic circles. Any attempt to achieve a degree of reunion between east and west during the Middle Ages was thus complicated by a complex network of political, historical, and theological factors. By the time of the fall of Constantinople, the differences between east and west remained as wide as ever.

To appreciate the distinctive nature of Byzantine theology, we need to consider its general outlook. Byzantine theologians were not particularly concerned with systematic formulations of the Christian faith. For them, Christian theology was something “given” and which therefore needed to be defended against its opponents and explained to its adherents. The idea of “systematic theology” is somewhat foreign to the general Byzantine ethos. Even John of Damascus, whose work On the Orthodox Faith is of considerable importance in the consolidation of a distinctively eastern Christian theology, is to be seen primarily as an expositor of the faith, rather than as a speculative or original thinker.

Byzantine theology can be regarded as remaining faithful to a principle originally set out by Athanasius in his writing On the Incarnation, which affirmed that theology was the expression of the mind of the saints. Byzantine theology (including its modern descendants in both Greek and Russian orthodoxy) is thus strongly oriented toward the idea of paradosis (“tradition”), particularly the writings of the Greek fathers. Writers such as Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394), Maximus the Confessor (c.580–662), and the unknown writer who adopted the pseudonym “Dionysius the Areopagite” (believed to have lived in the late fifth and early sixth centuries) are of particular importance in this respect.

Two Byzantine theological controversies were of particular importance. The first, which broke out during the period 725–842, is usually referred to as the iconoclastic (“breaking of images”) controversy. It erupted over the decision of Emperor Leo III (685–741; reigned 717–41) to destroy icons, on the grounds that they were barriers to the conversion of Jews and Muslims. The controversy was mainly political, although there were some serious theological issues at stake, most notably the extent to which the doctrine of the incarnation justified the depiction of God in the form of images.

The second controversy, which broke out in the fourteenth century, focused on the issue of hesychasm (Greek: hesychia, “silence”), a style of meditation through physical exercises which enabled believers to see the “divine light” with their own eyes. Hesychasm placed considerable emphasis upon the idea of “inner quietness” as a means of achieving a direct inner vision of God. It was particularly associated with writers such as Simeon the New Theologian (949–1022) and Gregory Palamas, who was elected archbishop of Thessalonika in 1347. Its opponents argued that its methods tended to minimize the difference between God and creatures, and were particularly alarmed by any suggestion that God could be “seen.”

In responding to this criticism, Palamas developed the doctrine now generally known as “Palamism,” which draws a distinction between the divine energies and the divine essence. The distinction allowed Palamas to defend hesychasm by affirming that it enabled believers to encounter the divine energies but not the unseen and ineffable divine essence. Believers cannot participate directly in the divine essence; however, they are able to participate directly in the uncreated energies which are God's mode of union with believers.

Palamas's theology was espoused and developed particularly by the lay theologian Nicolas Cabasilas (c.1320–c.1390), whose Life in Christ remains a classic work of Byzantine spirituality. His work has been reappropriated in more recent years by Neopalamite writers such as Vladimir Lossky (1903–58) and John Meyendorff (1926–92; see pp. 124, 261).

The golden era of Byzantine theology came to an end in 1453, when the great city of Constantinople finally fell to Turkish Islamic armies, which were conducting a jihad (“holy war”) against Christians in the region. This event marked the end of an age. With the fall of Byzantium, intellectual and political leadership within Orthodoxy largely passed to Russia. The Russians had been converted through Byzantine missions in the tenth century, and took the side of the Greeks in the schism of 1054. By the end of the fifteenth century, Moscow and Kiev were firmly established as patriarchates, each with its own distinctive style of Orthodox theology. It was only when Greece, now part of the Ottoman empire, finally broke free from Turkish rule in 1831 that the renewal of Orthodox theology in that region was able to begin.

It will be clear from the material presented in this chapter that Christian theology underwent significant development in both eastern and western Europe during the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Subsequent generations of theologians have regarded the period as being of landmark significance in relation to several areas of theological reflection, with a number of its writers being regarded as possessing permanent importance. The rise and fall of Byzantium is of particular importance to a full understanding of the subsequent development of eastern Orthodoxy in Russia and Greece, just as the rise of scholasticism and humanism were of considerable importance to the shaping of western theology.

Key Theologians

Of the many theologians of importance to have emerged during this period of enormous creativity, the following are of especial interest and significance.

John of Damascus (c.676–749)

The Syrian theologian known as John of Damascus was one of the eastern church's most influential thinkers, and is often regarded as the last of the Greek fathers. At this time, Islam was sweeping through much of North Africa and the Levant, and Syria was firmly under Islamic control. John was brought up within the household of the caliph of Damascus, Abdul Malek (645–705), and succeeded his father as the caliph's chief financial officer. We know little about him and are dependent upon unreliable later sources for the fragmentary information that has been passed down to us. At some point, probably during the period 726–30, he resigned his position within the caliph's court and entered the monastery of St. Sabas, southeast of Jerusalem.

At an early stage in his career, he was drawn into the iconoclastic controversy, and vigorously opposed those who wanted to destroy icons. Paradoxically, John's position within an Islamic household prevented his many enemies in Byzantium from taking any action against him. His defense of the use of icons involves an appeal to the doctrine of the incarnation, both as a basis for establishing the divine willingness to become visible and as a ground for the use of material forms to represent the divine likeness or convey divine truths.

John is remembered for his work The Fountain of Wisdom, which consists of three parts. The first part deals principally with Aristotle's concept of ontology, apparently on the assumption that this would assist in the understanding of Christian doctrine. The second part is an updated reworking of an earlier work on heresy by Epiphanius of Constantia (c.310–403). The third part is the most important and interesting. Entitled “A Precise Analysis of the Orthodox Faith,” it sets out in detail the fundamentals of the Christian faith, as John had received them from earlier writers. This section of the treatise is often treated as a work in its own right, and is generally referred to simply as “The Orthodox Faith.” It was highly regarded by both Latin-speaking and Greek-speaking Christians, and was translated into Latin in 1150 by Burgundio of Pisa (died 1193). This edition is cited by both Peter Lombard in his Four Books of the Sentences and Thomas Aquinas in his Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”).

Simeon (or Symeon) was born into a wealthy family in Paphlagonia, Asia Minor, in 949. At the age of 11, he was sent to the great city of Constantinople for further study. His parents had aspirations that he would go on to a political career, but he had a spiritual experience at the age of 20 which convinced him of the importance of a direct encounter with God. Although he did not immediately give up on his political hopes, his ecstatic experience of God as a living presence of radiant light had clearly made a deep impression on him. At the age of 27, he entered the monastery of Studios and came under the spiritual direction of Symeon the Pious (c.918–86), changing his given name, George, as a mark of respect for his mentor. He subsequently entered the monastery of St. Mamas in Constantinople, where he was ordained priest and eventually became the abbot. During this period, he set about renewing the monastery's life of prayer and meditation, and wrote a number of spiritual treatises, emphasizing the power of contemplative prayer and meditation.

Simeon remains one of the most important theological influences on modern Orthodoxy, reflecting the high regard in which he is held. His theology echoes many of the now-traditional themes of Byzantine doctrine, particularly an emphasis upon the doctrine of the incarnation and an accentuation of redemption as deification. He is called Simeon the New Theologian within Orthodoxy to distinguish him from John the Evangelist (known as John the Theologian) and Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89, known as Gregory the Theologian in the eastern Orthodox tradition).

Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109)

Anselm was born in northern Italy but soon moved to France, which was by then establishing a reputation as a center for religious learning. He quickly mastered the arts of logic and grammar, and acquired a formidable reputation as a teacher at the Norman abbey of Bec. Standing at the dawn of the theological renaissance of the twelfth century, Anselm made decisive contributions to two areas of discussion: proofs of the existence of God, and the rational interpretation of Christ's death upon the cross.

In his treatise known as the Proslogion (the word is virtually untranslatable), written around 1079, Anselm set out to formulate an argument supporting belief in the existence and character of God as highest good. The resulting analysis is often known as the “ontological argument,” although Anselm does not really regard it as an “argument” and does not state it in an “ontological” way – both those developments are found in the writings of Descartes (1596–1650). Anselm holds that, if God is understood as “that than which nothing greater can be conceived,” the existence of God turns out to be implied in the definition. Although this argument has been contested since its inception, it has remained one of the most intriguing components of philosophical theology to this day. The Proslogion is also of importance on account of its clear appeal to reason in matters of theology and its appreciation of the role of logic. In many ways, the work anticipates the best aspects of scholastic theology. Anselm's phrase fides quaerens intellectum (“faith seeking understanding”) has passed into widespread use.

Following the Norman invasion of England (1066), Anselm was invited to become archbishop of Canterbury in 1093, thus ensuring the consolidation of Norman influence over the English church. It was not an entirely happy period of his life, due to a series of violent disputes between the church and the monarchy over land rights. During one period spent working away from England in Italy, Anselm penned perhaps his most important work, “Why God became Man.” In this work, Anselm sought to set out a rational demonstration of the necessity of God becoming man, and an analysis of the benefits that accrue to humanity as a result of the incarnation and obedience of the Son of God.

This argument, to be considered at length later in this work (see pp. 259–60), remains of foundational importance to any discussion of “theories of the atonement” – in other words, understandings of the meaning of the death and resurrection of Christ, and its significance for humanity. Once more, the work exhibits the characteristics which are typical of scholasticism at its best: the appeal to reason, the logical marshaling of arguments, the relentless exploration of the implications of ideas, and the fundamental conviction that, at its heart, the Christian gospel is rational and can be shown to be rational.

Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74)

Thomas Aquinas was born at the castle of Roccasecca in Italy, the youngest son of Count Landulf of Aquino. To judge by his nickname – “the dumb ox” – he was rather portly. In 1244, while in his late teens, Aquinas decided to join the Dominican order, also known as the Order of Preachers. His parents were hostile to this idea: they rather hoped he would become a Benedictine, and perhaps end up as abbot of Monte Cassino, one of the most prestigious positions in the medieval church. His brothers forcibly imprisoned him in one of the family's castles for a year to encourage him to change his mind. Despite this intense opposition from his family, Aquinas eventually got his way, and ended up becoming one of the most important religious thinkers of the Middle Ages. One of his teachers is reported to have said that “the bellowing of that ox will be heard throughout the world.”

Aquinas began his studies at Paris before moving to Cologne in 1248. In 1252, he returned to Paris to study theology. Four years later, he was granted permission to teach theology at the university. For the next three years, he lectured on Matthew's gospel and began to write the Summa contra Gentiles (“Summary against the Gentiles”). In this major work, Aquinas provided important arguments in favor of the Christian faith for the benefit of missionaries working among Jews and Muslims. In 1266, he began the most famous of his many writings, usually known by its Latin title, Summa theologiae. In this work, Thomas developed a detailed study of key aspects of Christian theology (such as the role of reason in faith) as well as a detailed analysis of key doctrinal questions (such as the divinity of Christ). The work is divided into three parts, with the second part subdivided into two. Part one deals chiefly with God the creator; part two, divided into two sections known as the prima secundae and the secunda secundae (literally, the “first of the second” and the “second of the second”), deals with the restoration of humanity to God; and part three considers the manner in which the person and work of Christ bring about the salvation of humanity.

On December 6, 1273, Aquinas declared that he could write no longer. “All that I have written seems like straw to me,” he said. It is possible that he had some sort of breakdown, perhaps brought on by overwork. He died on March 7, 1274. Among Aquinas's key contributions to theology, the following are of especial importance, and are discussed elsewhere in this volume:

- the “Five Ways,” arguments for the existence of God (see pp. 158–60);
- the principle of analogy, which provides a theological foundation for knowing God through the creation (see pp. 165–6);
- the relationship between faith and reason (see pp. 127–30).

Duns Scotus (c.1266–1308)

Scotus was unquestionably one of the finest minds of the Middle Ages. In his short life, he taught at Cambridge, Oxford, and Paris and produced three versions of a “Commentary on the Sentences.” Known as the “subtle doctor” on account of the very fine distinctions that he frequently drew between the possible meanings of terms, he was responsible for a number of developments of considerable significance to Christian theology. Only three can be noted here.

First, Scotus was a champion of the theory of knowledge associated with Aristotle. The earlier Middle Ages were dominated by a different theory of knowledge, going back to Augustine of Hippo, known as “illuminationism,” in which knowledge was understood to arise from the illumination of the human intellect by God. This view, which was championed by writers such as Henry of Ghent (c.1217–93), was subjected to devastating criticism by Scotus.

Second, Scotus regarded the divine will as taking precedence over the divine intellect, a doctrine often referred to as “voluntarism.” Thomas Aquinas had argued for the primacy of the divine intellect;

Scotus opened the way to new approaches to theology, based on the assumption of the priority of the divine will. An example illustrates the point. Consider the idea of merit – that is to say, a human moral action which is deemed worthy of reward by God. What is the basis of this decision? Aquinas argued that the divine intellect recognizes the inherent worth of the human moral act. It then informs the will to reward it appropriately. Scotus argued along very different lines. For him, the divine will to reward the moral action comes before any evaluation of the action's inherent worth. This approach is of considerable importance in relation to the doctrines of justification and predestination, and will be considered in more detail later (pp. 336–7).

Third, Scotus was a champion of the doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Thomas Aquinas had taught that Mary shared the common sinful condition of humanity. She was tainted by sin (Latin: macula) like everyone else, apart from Christ. Scotus, however, argued that Christ, by virtue of his perfect work of redemption, was able to keep Mary free from the taint of original sin. Such was the influence of Scotus that the “immaculate position” (from the Latin immacula, “free of sin”) became dominant by the end of the Middle Ages.

In many ways, Ockham may be regarded as developing some of the lines of argument associated with Scotus. Of particular importance is his consistent defense of a voluntarist position, giving priority to the divine will over the divine intellect. It is, however, probably his philosophical position which has ensured his permanent place of note in the history of Christian theology. Two major elements of his teaching may be noted.

First is “Ockham's razor,” often referred to as “the principle of parsimony.” Ockham insisted that simplicity was both a theological and a philosophical virtue. His “razor” eliminated all hypotheses which were not absolutely essential. This had major implications for his theology of justification. Earlier medieval theologians (including Thomas Aquinas) had argued that God was obliged to justify sinful humanity by means of what was called a “created habit of grace” – in other words, an intermediate supernatural entity, infused by God into the human soul, which permitted the sinner to be pronounced justified. Ockham dismissed this notion as an unnecessary irrelevance and declared that justification was the direct acceptance of a sinner by God. There was no need for this intermediate step in the acceptance of the individual by God. What Aquinas held to take place by an intermediate entity, Ockham declared to take place directly, without any intermediate such as a “created habit of grace.” The way was thus opened to the more personalist approaches to justification such as those associated with the Reformation.

Second, Ockham was a vigorous defender of “nominalism.” In part, this resulted from his use of the razor: universals were declared to be a totally unnecessary hypothesis and were thus eliminated. The growing impact of the “modern way” in western Europe owes a considerable debt to Ockham. One aspect of his thought which proved to be of especial importance is the “dialectic between the two powers of God.” This device allowed Ockham to contrast the way things are with the way things could have been. A full discussion of this follows later (pp. 188–9); for the moment, it is enough to note that Ockham made a decisive contribution to discussions of divine omnipotence, which are of continuing importance today.

Desiderius Erasmus is generally regarded as the most important humanist writer of the Renaissance, and he had a profound impact upon Christian theology during the first half of the sixteenth century. He was one of the first theologians to exploit the new medium of printing as a means of spreading his ideas. Erasmus did much to lay the intellectual foundations of the sixteenth-century Reformations, not least through his extensive editorial undertakings, including the production of the first printed text of the Greek New Testament (see pp. 36–7) and extensive editions of patristic writers. His Handbook of the Christian Soldier became a bestseller and was a landmark in religious publishing.

His Handbook developed the then revolutionary and highly attractive thesis that the church of the day could be reformed by a collective return to the writings of the fathers and the Bible. The regular reading of Scripture is put forward as the key to a new lay piety, on the basis of which the church may be renewed and reformed. Erasmus conceived of his work as a layperson's guide to Scripture, providing a simple yet learned exposition of the "philosophy of Christ." This "philosophy" is really a form of practical morality rather than an academic philosophy. The New Testament addresses the knowledge of good and evil, in order that its readers may eschew the latter and love the former. The New Testament is the "law of Christ," which Christians are called to obey. Christ is the example whom Christians are called to imitate. Yet Erasmus does not understand Christian faith to be a mere external observance of a moral code. His characteristically humanist emphasis upon inner religion leads him to suggest that the reading of Scripture transforms its readers, giving them a new motivation to love God and their neighbors.

Erasmus also undertook extensive scholarly projects, two of which are of especial importance to the development of Christian theology:

1. The production of the first printed Greek New Testament. As noted earlier, this allowed theologians direct access to the original text of the New Testament, with explosive results.
2. The production of reliable editions of patristic works, including the writings of Augustine. Theologians thus had access to the full texts of such major works, instead of having to rely upon second-hand quotations, known as “sentences,” which were often taken out of context. A new understanding of Augustine's theology began to emerge as a result, with significant implications for the theological development of the period.

Key Theological Debates and Developments

The major renaissance in theology which took place during the period under consideration focused on a number of issues, of which the following are of especial importance. They will simply be noted briefly at this point; detailed discussion of most of them will take place later in this work.

The Consolidation of the Patristic Heritage

During the theological renaissance of the twelfth century and following, Christian theologians began to consolidate and extend the rich heritage of theological resources passed on to them from the patristic era. As the western church was Latin-speaking, it was natural that its theologians should turn to the substantial collection of works by Augustine of Hippo as a starting point for their own theological reflections. Peter Lombard's Four Books of the Sentences may be regarded as a critical compilation of quotations (“sentences”) drawn largely from the writings of Augustine, upon which medieval theologians were required to comment.

The Exploration of the Role of Reason in Theology

The new concern to establish Christian theology upon a totally reliable foundation led to a considered exploration of the role of reason in theology, a central and defining characteristic of scholasticism (see p. 35). As the theological renaissance of the early Middle Ages proceeded, two themes began to dominate theological debate: the need to systematize and expand Christian theology and the need to demonstrate the inherent rationality of that theology.

Although most early medieval theology was little more than a replay of the views of Augustine, there was growing pressure to systematize Augustine's ideas, and take them further. But how could this be done? A “theory of method” was urgently needed. And on the basis of what philosophical system could the rationality of Christian theology be demonstrated?

The eleventh-century writer Anselm of Canterbury gave expression to this basic belief in the rationality of the Christian faith in two Latin phrases which have come to be linked with his name: fides quaerens intellectum (“faith seeking understanding”) and credo ut intellegam (“I believe, in order that I may understand”). His basic insight was that, while faith comes before understanding, the content of that faith is nevertheless rational. These definitive formulae established both the priority of faith over reason and the entire reasonableness of faith. Nevertheless, Anselm was no rationalist – he knew that reason has its limits!

The eleventh and early twelfth centuries saw a growing conviction that philosophy could be an invaluable asset to Christian theology at two different levels. In the first place, it could demonstrate the reasonableness of faith, and thus defend it against non-Christian critics. In the second place, it offered ways of systematically exploring and arranging the articles of faith, so that they could be better understood. But which philosophy? The answer to this question came through the rediscovery of the writings of Aristotle, in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. By about 1270, Aristotle had become established as “the Philosopher.” His ideas came to dominate theological thinking, despite fierce opposition from more conservative quarters.

Through the influence of writers such as Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus, Aristotle's ideas became established as the best means of consolidating and developing Christian theology. The ideas of Christian theology were thus arranged and correlated systematically, on the basis of Aristotelian presuppositions. The defense of the rationality of Christian faith often involved an appeal to Aristotelian ideas. Thomas Aquinas's Summa contra Gentiles is an excellent example of a work of theology which draws on Aristotelianism as a common philosophy shared by Christians and Muslims, which would allow the attractiveness of the Christian faith to be explained within the Islamic world.

Scholasticism: The Development of Theological Systems

We have already noted the pressure to consolidate the patristic, especially the Augustinian, heritage (p. 34). This pressure to systematize, which is integral to scholasticism, led to the development of the sophisticated theological systems of scholasticism noted earlier. Thomas Aquinas's Summa theologiae is widely seen as one of the best statements of this comprehensive and all-embracing approach to Christian theology.

This emphasis on the importance of theological systems led to the emergence of a number of “schools” of theology in the later Middle Ages. Of particular importance were those generally known as Thomist (based on the writings of Thomas Aquinas) or Scotist (based on the writings of Duns Scotus), and those based on the via moderna (“the modern way”), which drew on the ideas of William of Ockham.

This emphasis on harmonization and coherence is reflected in one of the most significant themes of scholasticism – the use of disputation. This is seen in the dialectical approach adopted in landmark works of scholasticism, such as Aquinas's Summa theologiae and especially his Disputed Questions, such as the “Disputed Questions on Truth.” In these works, based on university lectures at Paris, Aquinas opens up a question for general discussion and notes a range of opinions. After engaging with these positions, Aquinas presents a counterproposal and then shows how his own position is better than those of his opponents. This often involves a distinction between various meanings of terms and the interpretation of various authorities to fit in with Aquinas's own position. This dialectical approach was easily extended from theology to other disciplines – such as philosophy and the emerging natural sciences.

The Development of Sacramental Theology

The early church had been somewhat imprecise in its discussion of the sacraments. There was little general agreement concerning either how the term “sacrament” was to be defined or what items were to be included in a list of the sacraments (see pp. 382–5). Baptism and the Eucharist (holy communion) were generally agreed to be sacramental; sadly, there was relatively little agreement on anything else. However, with the theological renaissance of the Middle Ages, the church was coming to play an increasingly important role in society. There was new pressure for the church to place its acts of public worship on a secure intellectual footing, and to consolidate the theoretical aspects of its worship. As a result, sacramental theology developed considerably during the period. Agreement was reached on the definition of a sacrament, the number of the sacraments, and the precise identity of these sacraments.

The Development of the Theology of Grace

A central element of the Augustinian heritage was a theology of grace. However, Augustine had been obliged to state his theology of grace in the heat of a controversy, often in response to the challenges and provocations of his opponents. As a result, his writings on the subject were often unsystematic. Occasionally, Augustine developed distinctions in response to the needs of the moment, and failed to lay an adequate theological foundation for at least some of them. The theologians of the Middle Ages saw themselves as charged with the task of consolidating Augustine's doctrine of grace, placing it upon a more reliable foundation, and exploring its consequences. As a result, the doctrines of grace and justification were developed considerably during the period, laying the foundation for the Reformation debates over these central issues.

The Role of Mary in the Scheme of Salvation

This new interest in grace and justification led to a new concern with understanding the role of Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, in salvation. Growing interest in devotion to Mary, linked with intense theological speculation concerning the nature of original sin and redemption, led to a series of developments relating to Mary. Many of these are linked with Duns Scotus, who is credited with placing Mariology (that is, the area of theology dealing with Mary) on a considerably more developed foundation than before.

Intense debate broke out between “maculists” (who held that Mary was subject to original sin, like everyone else) and “immaculists” (who held that she was preserved from the taint of original sin). There was also considerable discussion over whether Mary could be said to be coredemptrix (that is to say, whether she was to be regarded as a figure of redemption, in a manner similar to Jesus Christ).

The Renaissance: Returning to the Original Sources of Theology

A central element of the humanist agenda was the return to the original sources of western European culture in classical Rome and Athens. The theological counterpart to this element was the direct return to the foundational resources of Christian theology, above all in the New Testament. This agenda led to a new appreciation of the foundational importance of Scripture as a theological resource, and to patristic writers as early interpreters of Scripture.

The first printed Greek New Testament was produced by Erasmus in 1516. Erasmus's text was not as reliable as it ought to have been: he had access to a mere four manuscripts for most of the New Testament, and only one for its final part, the book of Revelation. As it happened, the manuscript left out five verses, which Erasmus himself had to translate into Greek from the Latin of the Vulgate. Nevertheless, it proved to be a literary milestone. For the first time, theologians had the opportunity of comparing the original Greek text of the New Testament with the later Vulgate translation into Latin. And they soon found that some doctrines seemed to be based on faulty Latin translations of the original Greek text of the New Testament.

Erasmus showed that the Vulgate translation of several major New Testament texts could not be justified – with important theological implications. Two examples of translation errors will help to bring out the theological relevance of Erasmus's biblical scholarship.

1. The Vulgate translated the opening words of Jesus's ministry (Matthew 4: 17) as “do penance, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” This translation suggested that the coming of the kingdom of heaven had a direct connection with the sacrament of penance. Erasmus pointed out that the original Greek text should be translated as “repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” In other words, where the Vulgate seemed to refer to an outward practice (the sacrament of penance), Erasmus insisted that the reference was to an inward psychological attitude – that of “being repentant.” Once more, an important justification of the sacramental system of the medieval church was challenged.
2. According to the Vulgate translation of Luke 1: 28, the angel Gabriel greeted Mary as one who is “full of grace” (Latin: gratia plena), thus suggesting the image of a reservoir full of grace, which could be drawn upon at time of need. But, as Erasmus pointed out, the Greek text simply meant “favored one,” or “one who has found favor.” Mary was one who had found God's favor, not necessarily one who could bestow it on others. The biblical basis of an important development within medieval theology thus seemed to be called into question by humanist New Testament scholarship.

These developments undermined the credibility of the Vulgate translation and opened the way to theological revision on the basis of a better understanding of the biblical text. They also demonstrated the importance of biblical scholarship in relation to theology. Theology could not be permitted to base itself upon translation mistakes! The recognition of the vitally important role of biblical scholarship in Christian theology thus dates from the second decade of the sixteenth century. It also led to the theological concerns of the Reformation, which we shall consider in the next chapter.

In the following chapter, we turn to an exploration of the emergence of the movement widely known as “the Reformation,” which is generally regarded as having established the distinctive features of modern western Christianity, both Roman Catholic and Protestant.

THE AGE OF REFORMATION, C.1500–C.1750

Christian theology underwent major development and transformation during the Middle Ages. At its height, this period produced some highly significant contributions to Christian theology, several of which – especially those of Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) – remain widely discussed today. Yet, by the end of the Middle Ages, there was pressure for change. The Renaissance consolidated its hold on many centers of theological education and scholarship, creating pressure for new theological paradigms and expressions. Humanist writers disliked the complexity of scholasticism and preferred direct engagement with the New Testament or with the writings of leading patristic writers, such as Jerome (c.347–420) or Augustine (354–430). The scene was set for a major shift in the methods, concepts, and vocabulary of Christian theology in western Europe. Historically, this paradigm shift began to take place in the early sixteenth century. The movement in question was complex, yet is often referred to using a single phrase – the Reformation.

The Main Movements of the Age of Reformation

The term “Reformation” is used in a number of senses, and it is helpful to distinguish them. Many works of theology and church history use the term to group together four elements: Lutheranism, the Reformed church (often referred to as “Calvinism”), the “radical Reformation” (often still referred to as “Anabaptism”), and the “Counter-Reformation” or “Catholic Reformation.” In its broadest sense, the term “Reformation” is used to refer to all four movements, although the term is sometimes used to refer to specifically Protestant movements around this time. Some recent studies use the plural form “Reformations” to emphasize that this was a multifaceted movement.

For historians, the importance of this period lies in the social and political ramifications of the Reformations; the birth of confessional Europe; the intensification of religious, social, and sexual discipline on the part of secular and ecclesiastical authorities; the rise of capitalism in its modern forms; and the origins of the wars of religion.

Yet the period is of pivotal importance to the development of modern Christian theology, as will become clear in this chapter. The rise of new forms of Christianity raised fundamental questions about the nature of the church, what was required in order to be “saved” (and the language to be used to discuss this), the location of theological authority, the role of tradition in Christian life and thought, and above all the question of how the Bible was to be interpreted. Theological debate and disagreement flourished during this restless and unstable period in western Europe, which played a major role in shaping theological debate of later periods.

This chapter also considers some of the developments which took place during the later part of this period, as western European forms of Christianity (primarily Protestantism) migrated from their European context to the “New World.” Christian theology gradually began to expand beyond its western European base and become a global phenomenon – a development which received final consolidation in the modern period, to which we shall turn in the next chapter.

In response to the Protestant Reformation, the Catholic church moved to put its own house in order. It was prevented from calling a reforming council in the 1530s and early 1540s due to political instability in Europe resulting from tensions between France and Germany. Eventually, the pope of the day (Paul III, 1468–1549) was able to convene the Council of Trent (1545). This set itself the task of clarifying Catholic thought and practice and defending them against Catholicism's evangelical opponents. It remains a landmark in Catholic thought.

In what follows, we shall consider six main movements which emerged within this “Age of Reformation” and note something of their theological significance.

The German Reformation: Lutheranism

The Lutheran Reformation is particularly associated with the German territories and the pervasive personal influence of one charismatic individual: Martin Luther (1483–1546). Luther was particularly concerned with the doctrine of justification, which formed the central point of his religious thought. The Lutheran Reformation was initially an academic movement, concerned primarily with reforming the teaching of theology at the University of Wittenberg. Wittenberg was an unimportant university, and the reforms introduced by Luther and his colleagues within the theology faculty attracted little attention. It was Luther's personal activities – such as his posting of the famous “Ninety-five Theses,” protesting against selling indulgences to raise money for the rebuilding of St. Peter's basilica in Rome (October 31, 1517) – which attracted considerable interest and brought the ideas in circulation at Wittenberg to the attention of a wider audience.

The Lutheran Reformation really began in 1522, when Luther returned to Wittenberg from his enforced isolation in the Wartburg. At this point, Luther's program of academic reform changed into a program of reform of church and society. No longer was Luther's forum of activity the university world of ideas; he now found himself regarded as the leader of a religious, social, and political reforming movement which seemed to some contemporary observers to open the way to a new social and religious order in Europe. In fact, Luther's program of reform was much more conservative than that associated with his Reformed colleagues, such as Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531). Furthermore, it met with considerably less success than some anticipated.

Lutheranism remained restricted to German territories, and – apart from expansion into Scandinavia – never gained the foreign power bases that seemed to be, like so many ripe apples, ready to fall into its lap. Luther's understanding of the role of the “godly prince” (which effectively ensured that the monarch had control of the church) does not seem to have had the attraction that might have been expected, particularly in the light of the generally republican sentiments of Reformed thinkers such as John Calvin (1509–64).

The Swiss Reformation: The Reformed Church

The origins of the Swiss Reformation, which brought the Reformed churches (such as the Presbyterians) into being, lie in developments within the Swiss Confederation (Latin: Confederatio Helvetica, hence the modern abbreviation “CH” for Switzerland) in the early sixteenth century. Whereas the German Reformation had its origins primarily in an academic context, the Reformed church owed its origins to a series of attempts to reform the morals and worship of the church (but not necessarily its doctrine) according to a more biblical pattern. It must be emphasized that, although John Calvin gave this style of Reformation its definitive form, its origins are to be traced back to earlier reformers, such as Huldrych Zwingli and Heinrich Bullinger (1504–75), based in the leading Swiss city of Zurich.

Although most of the early Reformed theologians, such as Zwingli, had an academic background, their reforming programs were not academic in nature. They were directed toward the church as they found it in Swiss cities such as Zurich, Bern, and Basel. Whereas Luther was convinced that the doctrine of justification was of central significance to his program of social and religious reform, the early Reformed thinkers had relatively little interest in doctrine, let alone one specific doctrine. Their reforming program was institutional, social, and ethical, in many ways similar to the demands for reform emanating from the humanist movement.

The consolidation of the Reformed church is generally thought to have begun with the stabilization of the Zurich Reformation after Zwingli's death in battle (1531) under his successor, Heinrich Bullinger, and to have ended in the 1550s with the emergence of Geneva as its power base and John Calvin as its leading spokesman. The gradual shift in power within the Reformed church (initially from Zurich to Bern, and subsequently from Bern to Geneva) took place over the period 1520–60, eventually establishing the city of Geneva, its political system (republicanism), and its religious thinkers (initially Calvin and after his death Theodore Beza, 1519–1605) as predominant within the Reformed church. This development was consolidated through the establishment of the Genevan Academy (founded in 1559), at which Reformed pastors were trained. Although Geneva became part of Switzerland in 1814, in the aftermath of the Napoleonic wars, it was an independent city at the time of the Reformation. This means that the term “Swiss Reformation” is being used slightly loosely and anachronistically at this point.

The term “Calvinism” is often used to refer to the religious ideas of the Reformed church. Although still widespread in the literature relating to the Reformation, this practice is now generally discouraged. It is becoming increasingly clear that later sixteenth-century Reformed theology drew on sources other than the ideas of Calvin himself. To refer to later sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Reformed thought as “Calvinist” implies that it is essentially the thought of Calvin – and it is now generally agreed that Calvin's ideas were modified subtly by his successors. The term “Reformed” is now preferred, whether to refer to those churches (mainly in Switzerland, the Low Countries, and Germany) or religious thinkers (such as Theodore Beza, William Perkins, and John Owen) that based themselves upon Calvin's celebrated religious textbook, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, or to church documents (such as the influential Heidelberg Catechism of 1563) based upon it.

The Radical Reformation: Anabaptism

The term “Anabaptist” literally means “rebaptizer,” and refers to what was perhaps the most distinctive aspect of Anabaptist practice: the insistence that only those who had made a personal, public profession of faith should be baptized. Anabaptism seems to have first arisen around Zurich, in the aftermath of Zwingli's reforms within the city in the early 1520s. It centered on a group of individuals (among whom we may note Conrad Grebel, c.1498–1526) who argued that Zwingli was not being faithful to his own reforming principles. He preached one thing and practiced another. Although Zwingli professed faithfulness to the theological principle “by Scripture alone” (Latin: sola scriptura), Grebel argued that he retained a number of practices – including infant baptism, the close link between church and magistracy, and the participation of Christians in warfare – which were neither permitted nor demanded by Scripture. In the hands of such thinkers as Grebel, the sola scriptura principle would be radicalized; reformed Christians would believe and practice only those things explicitly taught in Scripture. Zwingli was alarmed by this, seeing it as a destabilizing development which threatened to cut off the Reformed church at Zurich from its historical roots and its continuity with the Christian tradition of the past.

A number of common elements can be discerned within the various strands of the Anabaptist movement: a general distrust of external authority; the rejection of infant baptism in favor of the baptism of adult believers; the common ownership of property; and an emphasis upon pacifism and nonresistance. To take up the third of these points: in 1527, the governments of Zurich, Bern, and St. Gallen accused the Anabaptists of believing “that no true Christian can either give or receive interest or income on a sum of capital; that all temporal goods are free and common, and that all can have full property rights to them.”

It is for this reason that Anabaptism is often referred to as the “left wing of the Reformation” (Roland H. Bainton) or the “radical Reformation” (George Hunston Williams). For Williams, the “radical Reformation” was to be contrasted with the “magisterial Reformation,” which he broadly identified with the Lutheran and Reformed movements. These terms are now widely accepted within Reformation scholarship.

The English Reformation: Anglicanism

The English Reformation took a somewhat different direction from its continental counterpart. Although there was at least some degree of popular pressure for a reform within the church, the leading force for reform was Henry VIII (1491–1547), who ascended the English throne in 1509. In 1527, Henry took the first steps to dissolve his marriage to Catherine of Aragon. This decision resulted from Henry's desire to ensure the succession to the English throne. The only child of this marriage, Mary Tudor, was female; Henry wanted a male heir. The pope refused to dissolve or annul the marriage, which would have opened the way to a remarriage.

As a result, Henry gradually moved to replace papal authority in England with his own authority. The creation of an English national church was part of this vision. Henry seems not to have been particularly interested in matters of doctrine or theology, preferring to concentrate upon the practicalities of religious and political power. His decision to appoint Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556) as archbishop of Canterbury led to at least some Protestant influence being brought to bear on the English church.

When Henry died in 1547, he was succeeded by his son, Edward VI (1537–53). Edward was only nine years old when he came to the throne; as a result, real power was exercised by his advisors, who were generally of a strongly Protestant persuasion. Cranmer, who remained in office as archbishop during Edward's reign, was able to bring in noticeably Protestant forms of public worship, and encouraged leading Protestant thinkers (such as Martin Bucer, 1491–1551, and Peter Martyr Vermigli, 1499–1562) to settle in England and give theological direction to the Reformation. However, Edward died unexpectedly early in 1553, leaving the nation in a state of religious flux.

Edward was succeeded by Mary Tudor (1516–58), who was strongly Catholic in her sympathies. She set in motion a series of measures which suppressed Protestantism and restored Catholicism. Some of the measures were deeply unpopular, most notably the public burning of Thomas Cranmer at Oxford in 1556. Cranmer was replaced as archbishop of Canterbury by Reginald Pole (1500–58), a moderate Catholic. At the time of Mary's early death in 1558, Catholicism had not yet been entirely re-established.

When Elizabeth (1533–1603) succeeded her half-sister to the throne, it was not entirely clear what direction her religious policies might take. In the event, Elizabeth pursued a complex policy, which seems to have been aimed at appeasing both Protestants and Catholics while allowing the queen to have supreme authority in matters of religion. What is usually referred to as “the Elizabethan Settlement” (1558–9) established the national English church as a Reformed episcopal church, having broadly Protestant articles of faith with a more Catholic liturgy.

The Catholic Reformation

This term is now generally used to refer to the revival within Catholicism in the period following the opening of the Council of Trent (1545). In older scholarly works, the movement is often designated the “Counter-Reformation”: as the term suggests, the Catholic church developed means of combating the Protestant Reformation, in order to limit its influence. It is, however, becoming increasingly clear that the Catholic church countered the Reformation partly by reforming itself from within, in order to remove the grounds of Protestant criticism. In this sense, the movement was a reformation of the Catholic church as much as it was a reaction against the Protestant Reformation.

The same concerns underlying the Protestant Reformation in northern Europe were channeled into the renewal of the Catholic church, particularly in Spain and Italy. The Council of Trent, the foremost component of the Catholic Reformation, clarified Catholic teaching on a number of confusing matters and introduced much-needed reforms in relation to the conduct of the clergy, ecclesiastical discipline, religious education, and missionary activity.

The movement for reform within the church was greatly stimulated by the reformation of many of the older religious orders and the establishment of new orders (such as the Jesuits). The more specifically theological aspects of the Catholic Reformation will be considered later in this book in relation to its teachings on Scripture and tradition, justification by faith, and the sacraments. As a result of the Catholic Reformation, many of the abuses which originally lay behind the demands for reform – whether these came from humanists or Protestants – were removed.

This movement for reform within the Catholic church was accompanied by an explicit theological engagement with the views of Protestant writers, such as Luther and Calvin. This new theological confidence is evident in the works of writers such as Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621). It is also reflected in the growing body of catechetical literature of this age, including the landmark “The Totality of Christian Doctrine (1555) by Peter Canisius (1521–97).

The Second Reformation: Confessionalization

The period now generally known as the “Second Reformation” attempted to consolidate the insights and achievements of the initial phase of Protestantism. This process is often referred to as “confessionalization,” referring to the emergence of forms of Christianity which defined themselves with reference to “confessions of faith,” such as the Augsburg Confession (1530). As Protestantism grew in strength, tensions between different Protestant groups – above all, Lutheran and Reformed churches – became of increasing significance, eventually rivaling the older tension between Protestantism and Catholicism.

In the 1560s, Calvinism began to make major inroads into previously Lutheran territory in Germany. Three major Christian groups were now firmly established in the same geographical area: Lutheranism, Calvinism, and Catholicism. All three were under considerable pressure to identify themselves and to distinguish themselves from their rivals. Lutherans had to explain how they differed from Calvinists on the one hand and Catholics on the other. Theology proved the most reliable way of identifying and explaining these differences: “We believe this, but they believe that.” The period 1559–1622, characterized by its new emphasis upon doctrine, is generally referred to as the “period of orthodoxy.” A new form of scholasticism began to develop within both Protestant and Catholic theological circles, as both sought to demonstrate the strengths of their positions and the weaknesses of those of their opponents.

Post-Reformation Movements

The Reformations, both Protestant and Catholic, were followed by a period of theological consolidation within both movements. Within Protestantism, both Lutheran and Reformed (or “Calvinist”), the period known as “Orthodoxy” opened up, characterized by its emphasis on doctrinal norms and definitions. Although sympathetic to this doctrinal trend, Puritanism placed considerably greater emphasis on spiritual and pastoral application. Pietism, in contrast, was hostile to this emphasis on doctrine, feeling that the stress on doctrinal orthodoxy obscured the need for a “living faith” on the part of believers. Within post-Tridentine Catholicism (that is, after the Council of Trent), increasing emphasis came to be placed on the continuity of the Catholic tradition, with Protestantism being viewed as innovative, and hence heterodox.

The Consolidation of Catholicism

The Council of Trent (1545–63) represented the definitive response of the Catholic church to the Reformation. The main achievements of the Council may be summarized as follows. First, the Council remedied the problems within the church which had contributed in no small way to the emergence of the Reformation in the first place. Measures were taken to end corruption and abuse within the church. Second, the Council set out the main lines of Catholic teaching on certain central areas of the Christian faith which had become controversial as a result of the Reformation, such as the relationship between Scripture and tradition, the doctrine of justification, and the nature and role of the sacraments. (It should be noted that Trent did not address issues such as Christology or the doctrine of the Trinity, precisely because these were not the subject of debate with its Protestant opponents.) As a result, Catholicism was now well prepared to meet the challenges of its Protestant opponents. The final decades of the sixteenth century saw the emergence of a confident, sustained, and significant critique of Protestantism from within the Catholic church.

One of the clearest signs of this new confidence can be seen in Catholic patristic scholarship. The Protestant appeal to the patristic period was initially so effective that some Catholic writers of the middle of the sixteenth century seem to have thought that patristic writers such as Augustine were actually proto-Protestants. However, the final third of the century saw increasing confidence among Catholic writers concerning the continuity between the patristic writers and themselves. The most important work to establish this continuity was Marguerin de la Bigne's Library of the Fathers, which appeared in eight folio volumes in 1575. This was followed up by major contributions from other writers such as Antoine Arnauld (1612–94).

This new confidence in the continuity of the Catholic tradition led to increasing emphasis being placed upon the constancy of Catholic teaching. Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet (1627–1704) published a History of the Variations of the Protestant Churches, which argued that the teaching of the church remained the same down the ages. The apostles had handed down to their successors a fixed deposit of truth, which had to be maintained from one generation to another. Since Protestants had departed from this teaching, either by introducing innovations or by denying some of its central elements, they had forfeited their right to be considered orthodox.

The teaching of the church is always the same. [...] The gospel is never different from what it was earlier. Therefore if anyone at any time should say that the faith includes something which was not said to be “of the faith” yesterday, it is heterodoxy, which is any teaching different from orthodoxy. There is no difficulty in recognizing false teaching, or argument about it: it is recognized at once, whenever it appears, simply because it is new.

The Latin slogan semper eadem (“always the same”) thus became a highly significant element of Catholic polemics against Protestantism. For Bossuet, Protestantism was easily shown to be an innovation – and was heterodox for that very reason.

Puritanism

One of the most important styles of theology associated with the English-speaking world emerged in late sixteenth-century England. Puritanism is probably best understood as a version of Reformed orthodoxy which laid particular emphasis on the experiential and pastoral aspects of faith. The writings of the leading Puritan theologians William Perkins (1558–1602), William Ames (1576–1633), and John Owen (1618–83) are clearly heavily influenced by Theodore Beza, particularly in relation to their teaching on the extent of the death of Christ and the divine sovereignty in providence and election.

Although Puritanism was a major theological and political force in early seventeenth-century England, its most significant development took place in the New World. The repressive religious policies of King Charles I (1600–49) forced many Puritans to leave England and settle on the eastern coastal regions of North America. As a result, Puritanism became a major shaping force in North American Christianity during the seventeenth century. The most significant American Puritan theologian was Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), who combined a Puritan emphasis upon divine sovereignty with a willingness to engage with the new questions being raised through the growth of a rational worldview. Although Edwards was much in demand as a spiritual director, especially in the aftermath of the eighteenth-century “Great Awakening” (in which he played a prominent, and probably decisive, role), his theology found its practical expression particularly in his ethics. His sermon series on 1 Corinthians 13 was published in 1746 as Charity and Its Fruits.

In some respects, particularly in relation to the issue of Christian experience, Puritanism shows affinities with Pietism, to which we now turn.

Pietism

As orthodoxy became more influential within mainstream Protestantism, so its potential defects and weaknesses became increasingly clear. At its best, Protestant orthodoxy was absorbed with the rational defense of Christian truth claims and a passionate concern for doctrinal correctness. Yet, too often, this came across as an academic preoccupation with logical niceties, rather than a concern for relating theology to the issues of everyday life. The term “Pietism” derives from the Latin word pietas (best translated as “piety” or “godliness”), and was initially a derogatory term used by the movement's opponents to describe its emphasis upon the importance of Christian doctrine for everyday Christian life.

The Pietist movement is usually regarded as having been inaugurated with the publication of Philipp Jakob Spener's (1635–1705) Pious Wishes in 1675. In this work, Spener lamented the state of the German Lutheran church in the aftermath of the Thirty Years' War (1618–48) and set out proposals for the revitalization of the church of his day. Chief among these was a new emphasis upon personal Bible study. The proposals were treated with derision by academic theologians; nevertheless, they were to prove influential in German church circles, reflecting growing disillusionment and impatience with the sterility of orthodoxy in the face of the shocking social conditions endured during the war. For Pietism, reformation of doctrine must always be accompanied by reformation of life.

Pietism developed in a number of different directions, especially in England and Germany. Among the representatives of the movement, two in particular should be noted.

1. Nikolaus Ludwig Graf von Zinzendorf (1700–60) founded the Pietist community generally known as the Herrnhuter, after the German village of Herrnhut. Alienated from what he regarded as the arid rationalism and barren orthodoxy of his time, Zinzendorf stressed the importance of a “religion of the heart,” based on an intimate and personal relationship between Christ and the believer. Zinzendorf's emphasis upon a personally appropriated faith finds expression in the slogan “a living faith,” which he opposed to what he saw as the dead credal assent of Protestant orthodoxy. These ideas would be developed in one direction by F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) and in another by John Wesley (1703–91), who may be regarded as introducing Pietism to England.
2. John Wesley founded the Methodist movement within the Church of England, which subsequently gave birth to Methodism as a denomination in its own right. Convinced that he “lacked the faith whereby alone we are saved,” Wesley discovered the need for a “living faith” and the role of experience in the Christian life through his conversion at a meeting in Aldersgate Street in London in May 1738, in which he felt his heart to be “strangely warmed.” Wesley's emphasis upon the experiential side of Christian faith, which contrasted sharply with the dullness of much contemporary English religion, led to a major revival in England.

Despite their differences, the various branches of Pietism succeeded in making the Christian faith relevant to the experiential world of ordinary believers. The movement may be regarded as a reaction against a one-sided emphasis upon doctrinal orthodoxy, in favor of a faith which relates to the deepest aspects of human nature.

The Copernican and Galilean Controversies

The early modern period witnessed the first of several controversies in which scientific progress raised questions of theological importance. In this section, we shall consider the ideas developed by Nicolaus Copernicus (1473–1543) and Galileo Galilei (1564–1642), and how they sparked serious theological debates over the interpretation of the Bible.

The model of the universe that was most widely accepted during the early Middle Ages was devised by Claudius Ptolemy, an astronomer who worked in the Egyptian city of Alexandria during the first half of the second century. His model placed the earth at the center of the universe. Increasingly detailed and precise observation of the movement of the planets and stars during the Middle Ages caused increasing difficulties for this theory.

During the sixteenth century, the geocentric model of the solar system was gradually abandoned in favor of a heliocentric model, which depicted the sun as lying at its center. Copernicus's treatise On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Bodies (1543) presented the earth as one of a number of planets orbiting the sun. This “Copernican revolution” represented a radical departure from the existing model, and must be regarded as one of the most significant changes in the human perception of reality to have taken place in the past millennium. The church had become so used to interpreting Scripture from a geocentric perspective that it assumed that this was the explicit teaching of Scripture itself.

Fresh controversy broke out over the heliocentric model of the solar system in Italy during the early decades of the seventeenth century. Debate now centered on the views of Galileo Galilei, who mounted a major defense of the Copernican theory of the solar system. Galileo's views were initially received sympathetically within senior church circles.

Although the controversy centering on Galileo is often portrayed as science versus religion, or libertarianism versus authoritarianism, the real issue once more concerned the correct interpretation of the Bible. Galileo's critics argued that some biblical passages contradicted him. For example, they argued, Joshua 10: 12 spoke of the sun standing still at Joshua's command. Did not that prove beyond reasonable doubt that it was the sun which moved around the earth? Galileo countered by arguing that this was simply a common way of speaking. Joshua could not be expected to know the intricacies of modern celestial mechanics, and therefore used an "accommodated" way of speaking.

The official papal condemnation of Galileo's view was mainly based on the argument that the Bible was to be interpreted "according to the common interpretation and understanding of the Holy Fathers and of learned theologians." In other words, innovative interpretations of the Bible were wrong, by definition. The views of Galileo were therefore to be rejected as innovations, without any precedent in Christian thought.

This second point needs to be set against the long-standing and bitter debate between Protestantism and Catholicism over whether the former represented a heterodox innovation or a legitimate recovery of authentic Christianity. The idea of the unchangeability of the Catholic tradition became an integral element of Catholic polemic against Protestantism. As we noted earlier (p. 44), Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet had insisted that "the teaching of the church is always the same." Novelty was a hallmark of heresy. And Galileo's interpretation of the Bible at this point seemed to represent an innovation.

The highly charged and politicized atmosphere at the time made it inevitable that Galileo's views would now meet with resistance. The key factor was that of theological innovation: to concede Galileo's interpretation of certain biblical passages would seriously undermine Catholic criticisms of Protestantism, which involved the assertion that Protestantism introduced new (and therefore erroneous) interpretations of certain biblical passages. Galileo had the misfortune to get caught up in the crossfire and undercurrents of this debate.

This debate is widely seen as marking the collision of religion and science, setting the scene for their “warfare” in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. This is an over-interpretation of its significance. It is fundamentally about finding the right way of interpreting the Bible and about dealing with earlier interpretations of the Bible that reflect the cultural and scientific assumptions of their age, rather than the biblical text itself. We shall explore how some models of biblical interpretation enabled the views of both Copernicus and Galileo to be accommodated within mainstream Christianity later in this work (pp. 169–70).

Key Theologians

The age of Reformation is widely regarded as one of the most creative in the history of Christian theology. We shall begin by considering the three theologians who are usually singled out as being of particular significance in the first period of this age: Martin Luther, John Calvin, and Huldrych Zwingli. Of these, the first two are of especial importance. Although Zwingli was a major figure in his own right, he was overshadowed by the creative talent and greater theological impact of Luther and Calvin. We shall then consider some theologians who were significant in the later phases of this period, and note their contributions to the development of theology.

Martin Luther (1483–1546)

Luther first came to public attention in 1517, through the publication of his “Ninety-five Theses” on indulgences. This was followed by the Leipzig Disputation (June–July 1519), in which Luther established a reputation as a radical critic of scholasticism. In 1520, he published three treatises which consolidated his growing reputation as a theological reformer. In the Appeal to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation, Luther argued passionately for the need for reform of the church. In both its doctrine and its practices, the church of the early sixteenth century had cast itself adrift from the New Testament. His pithy and witty German gave added popular appeal to some intensely serious theological ideas.

Encouraged by the remarkable success of this work, Luther followed it up with The Babylonian Captivity of the Christian Church. In this powerful piece of writing, Luther argued that the gospel had become captive to the institutional church. The medieval church, he argued, had imprisoned the gospel in a complex system of priests and sacraments. The church had become the master of the gospel, where it should be its servant. This point was further developed in The Liberty of a Christian, in which Luther explored the implications of the doctrine of justification by faith for the Christian life.

Luther was perhaps the most creative of the reformers. Yet his theological impact does not rest upon any major work of theology. Most of Luther's writings were produced in response to some controversy. Only his two Catechisms (1529) can really be thought of as systematic presentations of the basic ideas of the Christian faith. Their largely pastoral role probably disqualifies them from being taken seriously as works of academic theology. Nevertheless, aspects of Luther's theology have had a deep impact upon western Christian thought. For example, his "theology of the cross," set out briefly in a document of 1518 (the Heidelberg Disputation), has had a considerable impact upon twentieth- and twenty-first-century theology, as works such as Jürgen Moltmann's (born 1926) Crucified God indicate (see p. 184).

Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531)

The Swiss reformer Huldrych Zwingli was educated at the universities of Vienna and Basel before taking up parish duties in eastern Switzerland. (There is some variation in the spelling of Zwingli's forename, with "Ulrich" and "Huldreich" often being used in preference to "Huldrych.") It is clear that he took a keen interest in the agenda of Christian humanism, especially the writings of Erasmus (c.1466–1536), and believed strongly in the need to reform the church of his day. In 1519, he took up a pastoral position in the city of Zurich, where he used the pulpit of the Great Minster, the chief church within the city, to propagate a program of reform. Initially, this program was primarily concerned with the reformation of the morals of the church. However, it soon extended to include criticism of the existing theology of the church, especially its sacramental theology. The term "Zwinglian" is used especially to refer to the belief, associated with Zwingli, that Christ is not present at the Eucharist, which is best seen as a memorial of Christ's death.

Zwingli was of major importance in relation to the early propagation of the Reformation, especially in eastern Switzerland. However, he never achieved the same impact as Luther or Calvin, lacking the creativity of the former and the systematic approach of the latter.

John Calvin (1509–64)

Calvin was born in Noyon, northeast of Paris. Educated at the scholasticism-dominated University of Paris, he subsequently moved to the more humanist University of Orléans, at which he studied civil law. Although initially inclined to a career of scholarship, he underwent a conversion experience in his mid-twenties which led to his becoming increasingly associated with reforming movements in Paris, and he was later forced into exile in Basel. Eventually, he settled in the city of Geneva, which had recently achieved its independence from the Duchy of Savoy and had converted to Protestantism in 1535. By the time of his death in 1564, Calvin had made Geneva the center of an international movement that came to bear his name. Calvinism is still one of the most potent and significant intellectual movements in human history.

The second generation of reformers was far more aware of the need for works of systematic theology than the first. Calvin, the major figure of the second period of the Reformation, saw the need for a work which would clearly set out the basic ideas of evangelical theology, justifying them on the basis of Scripture and defending them in the face of Catholic criticism. In 1536, he published a small work entitled Institutes of the Christian Religion, a mere six chapters in length. For the next quarter of a century, Calvin worked away at this, adding extra chapters and rearranging the material. By the time of its final edition (1559), the work had 80 chapters and was divided into four books. By then, it was firmly established as one of the most important religious works of the sixteenth century.

Most of the writers noted in this chapter were systematic theologians. Teresa of Avilà represents a quite different approach to theology, which needs to be noted and respected – namely, “mystical theology” or spirituality. For Teresa, theology was about a transformed personal relationship with God, which cannot adequately be expressed in human words. Teresa was a Carmelite, part of the great revival of spirituality that took place in Spain during the second half of the sixteenth century. Her most famous work is The Interior Castle of the Soul (1577), in which she uses a fundamentally trinitarian theological framework to explore how God illuminates and transforms the life of the believer. Growth in prayer enables the individual believer to enter into deeper intimacy with God, using the image of a progressive journey through the apartments (or mansions) of the castle from the outermost to the luminous center. Teresa was declared to be a “doctor of the church” by Pope Paul VI (1897–1978) in 1970 – the first woman to be accorded this honor.

Theodore Beza (1519–1605)

Beza (also known by his French name Théodore de Bèze), a noted Calvinist writer, served as professor of theology at the Genevan Academy from 1559 to 1599. The three volumes of his Theological Treatises (1570–82) present a rationally coherent account of the main elements of Reformed theology, using Aristotelian logic. The result is a tightly argued and rationally defensible account of Calvin's theology, in which some of the unresolved tensions of that theology (chiefly relating to the doctrines of predestination and atonement) are clarified. Some writers have suggested that Beza's concern for logical clarity lead him to misrepresent Calvin at a number of critical points; others have argued that Beza merely streamlined Calvin's theology, tidying up some loose ends.

Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621)

Of the theologians to achieve eminence during the golden period of Catholic theology after the Council of Trent, the most important is probably Robert Bellarmine, who entered the Society of Jesus in 1560 and subsequently became professor of controversial theology at Rome in 1576. He remained in this position until 1599, when he became a cardinal. His most significant work is generally regarded to be his Disputations Concerning the Controversies of the Christian Faith (1586–93), in which he argued forcefully for the rationality of Catholic theology against its Protestant (both Lutheran and Calvinist) critics.

Johann Gerhard (1582–1637)

Gerhard was perhaps the most important Lutheran orthodox theologian. In 1616 he was appointed professor of theology at the University of Jena, where he remained for the rest of his teaching career. Gerhard recognized the need for a systematic presentation of Lutheran theology in the face of intense Calvinist opposition. The basic form of Lutheran works of systematic theology had been laid down in 1521, when Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560) published the first edition of his Commonplaces, in which subjects were treated topically rather than systematically. Gerhard continued this tradition but felt able to draw increasingly upon Aristotelian works of logic. His Theological Commonplaces (1610–22) remained a classic of Lutheran theology for many years.

Jonathan Edwards (1703–58)

It is universally agreed that Jonathan Edwards was America's first great theologian. Edwards played a major role in the “Great Awakening,” probably the most significant revivalist movement of his age. In 1757, Edwards was invited to become president of the College of New Jersey, Princeton (now Princeton University). Following an unsuccessful inoculation against smallpox, he died at Princeton on March 22, 1758.

Edwards is remembered as a remarkable theologian. He can be seen as a Puritan writer who gave intellectual and spiritual stamina to a movement often noted for its anti-intellectualism and moral excesses. Perhaps more importantly, Edwards was a theologian who was aware of the challenges to traditional Christian theology that were emerging from the Enlightenment, and had the foresight and theological acumen to provide an alternative way of conceptualizing and proclaiming the Christian faith within a rationalist culture.

Key Theological Debates and Developments

The age of Reformation witnessed intense theological debate over a number of topics, extending into the seventeenth century and beyond. The main issues discussed included the sources of Christian theology, the way in which these were to be interpreted, the nature of grace, and the nature of the church. We shall note these and reflect on their significance in what follows.

The Sources of Theology

The mainstream Reformation was concerned not with establishing a new Christian tradition but with the renewal and correction of an existing tradition. Maintaining that Christian theology was ultimately grounded in Scripture, reformers such as Luther and Calvin argued for the need to return to Scripture as the primary and critical source of Christian theology. The slogan “by Scripture alone” (sola scriptura) became characteristic of the Protestant reformers, expressing their basic belief that Scripture was the sole necessary and sufficient source of Christian theology. However, as we shall see later (pp. 122–6), this did not mean that they denied the importance of tradition.

This new emphasis upon Scripture had a number of direct consequences, of which the following are of especial importance:

1. Beliefs which could not be demonstrated to be grounded in Scripture were either to be rejected or to be declared as binding on no one. For example, the reformers had little time for the doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary (that is, the belief that Mary, as the mother of Jesus, was conceived without any taint from sin). They regarded this as lacking any biblical warrant, and thus discarded it.
2. A new emphasis came to be placed upon the public status of Scripture within the church. The expository sermon, the biblical commentary, and works of biblical theology (such as Calvin's Institutes) came to be characteristic of the Reformation.

The Council of Trent, responding to these developments, insisted that Scripture and tradition were to be given equal weight in theological deliberations. Writers such as Bellarmine argued that Scripture needed to be interpreted reliably; the Protestants had made it open to highly subjective individualist interpretations, which would be destructive to both church order and doctrine.

The Doctrine of Grace

The first period of the Reformation was dominated by the personal agenda of Martin Luther. Convinced that the church had lapsed into an unwitting Pelagianism, Luther developed his distinctive doctrine of justification by faith alone. The question “How can I find a gracious God?” and the slogan “by faith alone” (sola fide) resonated throughout much of western Europe, and attracted him a hearing among a substantial section of the church. The issues involved in this doctrine are complex and will be discussed in detail at the appropriate point later in this volume (see pp. 337–41).

The doctrine of justification by faith is especially associated with the Lutheran Reformation. Calvin, while continuing to honor this doctrine, initiated a trend which became of increasing importance in later Reformed theology: the discussion of grace in relation to the doctrine of predestination, rather than justification. For Reformed theologians, the ultimate statement of the “grace of God” was not to be seen in the fact that God justified sinners; rather, it was to be seen in God's election of humanity without reference to their foreseen merits or achievements. The doctrine of “unconditional election” (see p. 346) came to be seen as a concise summary of the unmerited nature of grace.

The Council of Trent and later Catholic writers regarded such views as a distortion of the teachings of Augustine, and argued vigorously for a return to his ideas. They maintained that the Protestant emphasis on justification by faith alone failed to do justice to the New Testament's emphasis on the importance of good works in the Christian life. In addition, they insisted that Protestants had misrepresented Augustine's teaching on what justification actually was, interpreting it to mean “being accounted as righteous,” whereas the clear sense of his teaching was “to be made righteous.”

The Doctrine of the Sacraments

The age of Reformation saw intense interest in the nature of the sacraments. While Catholicism offered a vigorous defense of the traditional notion of seven sacraments, the Protestant Reformation quickly coalesced around the belief that there were only two proper sacraments – baptism and the eucharist. Protestants also rejected the idea of “communion in one kind” – the practice of allowing clergy to receive bread and wine at the eucharist while restricting the laity to receiving bread alone.

So what did sacraments do? By the 1520s the view had become well established within reforming circles that the sacraments were outward signs of the invisible grace of God. This forging of a link between the sacraments and the doctrine of justification (a development especially associated with Luther and his colleague at Wittenberg, Philip Melanchthon) led to a new interest in the theology of the sacraments. It was not long before this area of theology became the subject of considerable controversy, with the reformers disagreeing with their Catholic opponents over the number and nature of the sacraments, and Luther and Zwingli arguing furiously over whether Christ was really present at communion services (see pp. 400–1).

The Council of Trent reaffirmed the traditional teaching concerning the number and identity of the sacraments, while strongly defending the concept of “transubstantiation” against its Protestant critics, both Lutheran and Reformed. While many Protestant writers tended to interpret the sacraments as signifying but not bestowing grace, Trent vigorously defended the traditional idea that sacraments caused and conveyed grace, rather than functioning simply as signs of grace.

The Doctrine of the church

If the first generation of reformers was preoccupied with the question of grace, the second generation turned to address the question of the church. Having broken away from the mainstream of the Catholic church over the doctrine of grace, the reformers came under increasing pressure to develop a coherent theory of the church which would justify this break and give a basis for the new evangelical churches springing up in the cities of western Europe. Writers such as Martin Bucer and John Calvin argued that the church was not to be defined institutionally but in terms of the preaching of the Word of God and the right administration of the sacraments. Such understandings have since become increasingly significant in global Christianity, and will be considered in greater detail later in the present work (see pp. 364–7).

In response to such developments, the Council of Trent re-emphasized the historical and institutional importance of the church, arguing that Protestants had placed themselves outside its bounds. The church was a divinely ordained and divinely instituted society; salvation was not possible outside its boundaries.

Developments in Theological Literature

The Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century led to significant developments in theological literature, reflecting the high profile of theological issues at the time. One of the most interesting aspects of the Protestant Reformation was its awareness of the need to communicate and defend its ideas. This led to several important genres of theological literature assuming a significant role at this time.

1. Catechisms: popular presentations of Christian faith, from a Reformation perspective, aimed particularly at educating children.
2. Confessions of faith: statements of the main theological affirmations of a grouping within the Reformation (Lutheran, Reformed, or Anabaptist), aimed at an adult audience.
3. Works of systematic theology, including Melancthon's Commonplaces and Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, which offered a systematic analysis and defense of Lutheran or Reformed theology.

We shall consider each of these genres of theological literature in what follows.

Catechisms

Although what would now be agreed to be catechisms can be found in the medieval church, it is generally considered that the extensive use of catechisms is especially associated with the Reformation. A visitation of Lutheran churches in Saxony over the period 1528–9 showed that most pastors and just about every layperson were ignorant of basic Christian teachings. Luther was shocked by his findings, and decided to increase public knowledge of basic Christian teachings by producing catechisms in German – the language of the people.

The first of Luther's catechisms appeared in April 1529. Although Luther himself termed it a “German Catechism,” it is now more generally known as the Greater Catechism. The work provides a detailed analysis of the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. These sections were followed by discussions of the two sacraments of the church: baptism and the “sacrament of the altar” (or Communion service). This was followed in May 1529 by what is now known as the Lesser Catechism. This work was written specifically for purpose and shows a lightness of touch, an ease of communication, and a general simplicity of expression which ensured that it was widely used and appreciated. Its question-and-answer format was ideally suited to learning by rote, and the work was widely adopted within the schools of the region.

The Reformed churches were not slow to appreciate the importance of this literary genre and the educational advantages which it so clearly offered. After some experimentation, Calvin finally produced the Geneva Catechism in French (1542) and Latin (1545). This catechism was widely used within the Reformed constituency until 1563. It was at this point that the Heidelberg Catechism made its appearance. The origins of this major work lie in the growth of the Reformed church within Germany, particularly within the Palatinate. Elector Frederick III (1515–76) commissioned two Reformed theologians (Kaspar Olevianus, 1536–87, and Zacharias Ursinus, 1534–83) to produce a catechism suitable for use in his churches. The result was a German-language catechism of 129 questions, which could be arranged in 52 blocks of material to permit regular teaching throughout the year.

The extensive Protestant use of catechisms, and the significant results that they achieved, led their Catholic opponents to develop the format. Earlier Catholic catechisms tended to avoid the question-and-answer format and offered extensive discussions of points of theological importance. An excellent example of this may be found in the 1537 catechism of Johann Dietenberger (c.1475–1537), which takes the form of a discussion of the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, the “Hail Mary,” and the seven sacraments. However, the superiority of the question-and-answer approach became obvious and was incorporated into the three catechisms of Peter Canisius (1521–97), published over the period 1554–8. This work was published in Latin, as was the more substantial Tridentine Catechism of 1566. While its cumbersome format ensured that it was hardly ever used, the work's appearance in the aftermath of the Council of Trent may be regarded as an important recognition of the significance of the genre.

Confessions of Faith

We have already noted how the Reformation placed considerable emphasis upon the authority of Scripture. Yet the Bible needed to be interpreted. As the controversy between the magisterial and radical reformers made clear, there were issues of interpretation that were both divisive and elusive. There was clearly a need for some form of “official” means of setting out the ideas of the Reformation, to avoid confusion. This role was played by the “confessions of faith.” In view of the importance of these documents, we may consider their place within the thought of the Reformation.

The magisterial Reformation, while placing considerable emphasis upon the authority of Scripture, also recognized a role for the Christian consensus of the past – an idea usually referred to as a “single-source theory of tradition” (see p. 125). In general terms, Protestant theologians can be considered as recognizing three levels or strata of authority.

1. Scripture. This was regarded by the magisterial reformers as possessing supreme authority in matters of Christian belief and conduct.

2. The creeds of Christendom. These documents, such as the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed, were regarded by the magisterial reformers as representing the consensus of the early church, and as being accurate and authoritative interpretations of Scripture. Although they were to be regarded as derivative or secondary in terms of their authority, they were seen as an important check against the individualism of the radical Reformation (which generally declined to regard these creeds as having any authority). The authority of the creeds was recognized by both Protestants and Catholics as well as by the various constituent elements within the mainstream Reformation.
3. Confessions of faith. These documents were regarded as authoritative by specific groupings within the Reformation. Thus, the Augsburg Confession (1530) was recognized by early Lutheran churches as possessing authority. Other groups within the Reformation did not, however, regard it in this way. Specific confessions of faith were, for example, drawn up by other groups within the Reformation. Some were linked with the Reformation in specific cities – for example, the First Confession of Basel (1534) and the Geneva Confession (1536).

The basic pattern within the Reformation was thus to acknowledge Scripture as possessing primary and universal authority; the creeds as having secondary and universal authority; and the confessions as having tertiary and local authority (in that such confessions were only regarded as binding by a denomination or church in a specific region). The development of the Reformed wing of the Reformation was complex, with the result that a number of confessions – each linked with a specific region – came to be influential. The following are of particular importance:

Date	Title	Geographical region
1559	Gallic Confession	France
1560	Scottish Confession	Scotland
1561	Belgic Confession	The Lowlands
1563	Thirty-Nine Articles	England
1566	Second Helvetic Confession	Western Switzerland

Works of Systematic Theology

The need for a systematic presentation of the theology of the Reformation was obvious from an early stage. The first work to fill this gap had its origins within the Lutheran Reformation. Philip Melanchthon established the definitive pattern for Lutheran works of systematic theology in 1521, through the publication of his Commonplaces. In its first edition, this work simply treated a number of subjects of obvious relevance to the Lutheran Reformation, including the important theme of justification by faith.

Gradually, however, polemical and educational considerations obliged Melanchthon to expand the work considerably. Melanchthon merely added material, regardless of the impression of a lack of unified structure that this created. It soon became evident that the result was clumsy and disorganized, incapable of achieving the systematic analysis needed for the theological debates of the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The greatest and last work of this kind was published by Johann Gerhard, professor at Jena, in nine volumes (1610–22). Melanchthon's approach to systematic theology ultimately lost out to the much more organized system of John Calvin, to which we now turn.

Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion had its origins within the Reformed wing of the Protestant Reformation. The first edition, published in March 1536, was modeled on Luther's Lesser Catechism of 1529. The second edition of the Institutes dates from Calvin's Strasbourg period, and was published in Latin in 1539. The final edition of 1559 had 80 chapters – a vast expansion from the original six chapters of 1536. The material was now distributed between four “books,” arranged as follows:

1. the knowledge of God the creator;
2. the knowledge of God the redeemer;
3. the manner of participation in the grace of Jesus Christ;
4. the external means or aids which God uses to bring us to Jesus Christ.

It is possible that Calvin had adapted the fourfold structure of the edition of 1543 to create the new division of material. An alternative explanation, however, is that he had noticed and adapted the fourfold division of material in the Four Books of the Sentences of Peter Lombard, a seminal medieval theologian to whom Calvin often refers. Was Calvin setting himself up as the Protestant successor to Peter Lombard, and his Institutes as the successor to his great theological textbook? We shall never be entirely clear about this. What we do know is that the Institutes were now firmly established as the most influential theological work of the Protestant Reformation, eclipsing in importance the rival works of Luther, Melanchthon, and Zwingli.

Part of the process of theological consolidation and renewal within Catholicism after the Council of Trent was the production of numerous works of systematic theology. These took a wide variety of forms. The form of loci or theological topics, originally introduced by the Protestant writer Melanchthon, proved attractive to many Catholic writers. The Spanish Dominican theologian Melchior Cano (1509–60) adopted this format, noting its advantages both as a convenient way of presenting Catholic teaching and also for systematically combating Protestant ideas. Cano's Theological Commonplaces was first published in 1563, three years after the author's death, and went into 26 editions: eight in Spain, nine in Italy, seven in Germany, and two in France. Numerous writers during the following century, such as Seraphimus Ractius (Razzi, died 1613) and Petrus de Lorca (died 1606), produced works using more or less the same format.

Most observers regard Catholic theology as being primarily concerned with refuting Protestantism at this time, and single out Robert Bellarmine for developing controversial theology to the point at which it virtually became a form of art. His most famous work is his Disputations Concerning the Controversies of the Christian Faith against the Heretics of this Age, first published in 1586.

THE MODERN PERIOD, C.1750 TO THE PRESENT

In this final historical section, we consider the development of Christian theology from c.1750 to the present day. During this period, Christianity underwent significant transformation and expansion outside its traditional European heartlands, while experiencing considerable difficulties and tensions within them. Though Christian theology remained deeply influenced by European and North American writers throughout this period, it gradually became a global phenomenon.

Given the vast expansion and diversification of Christian theological writing, exploration, and debate since about 1750, this survey chapter can do little more than note some important trends and developments. Limitations on space mean that a detailed engagement with everything that needs to be covered to gain a comprehensive overview of theology is quite impossible. We shall, however, try to gain something of a bird's-eye view of the contemporary theological landscape, even if we cannot fill in the fine detail that is needed for many purposes.

We begin by surveying some of the cultural developments that have shaped the environment in which Christian theology has been done in recent centuries. We shall then look at some theologians who have played an important role in shaping contemporary theology, all of whom are still cited and engaged in recent theological discussions. Finally, we consider some of the schools of thought or movements that have emerged as important during this period.

Theology and Cultural Developments in the West

The rise of the “modern age” created new challenges for Christian theology. As a result of the wars of religion, cultural suspicion of organized religion began to increase, raising questions about its social role and rationality. Perhaps more importantly, René Descartes' (1596–1650) Discourse on Method (1637) and Baruch Spinoza's (1632–77) Ethics (1677) created a philosophical culture which accentuated the role of reason in establishing and validating beliefs. The defining characteristic of modern philosophy is that it tries to establish its beliefs with certitude, without recourse to God, on the basis of the necessary truths of reason. The phrase “the Enlightenment” was introduced during the late nineteenth century to refer to this new cultural mood, emphasizing the foundational role of human reason, which gained the ascendancy in western culture during the eighteenth century.

The Enlightenment was a complex movement, taking different forms in various parts of Europe and America. However, one of its most characteristic features is its emphasis on the ability of human reason to penetrate the mysteries of the world. Humanity is able to think for itself, without the need for any assistance from God. Unaided human reason is able to make sense of the world – including those aspects of the world traditionally reserved for theologians. The phrase “Age of Reason,” often used as a synonym for the Enlightenment, is a little misleading. It implies that reason had been hitherto ignored or marginalized. As we saw in Chapter 2 (pp. 34–5), the Middle Ages can quite legitimately be thought of as an “Age of Reason” in its own terms. Yet the Middle Ages saw reason primarily as a critical tool; the Enlightenment treated it instead as the foundation of reliable knowledge.

So how did this change in cultural mood in the west come about? To answer this, we need to look at the rise of disinterest in religion in western Europe following the wars of religion.

The Wars of Religion and Disinterest in Religion

By 1700, western Europe was exhausted by seemingly endless wars of religion, which caused social disintegration and economic hardship. The Thirty Years' War (1618–48) was both an international religious conflict and a German civil war, involving Lutheran, Reformed, and Catholic regions and nations. When the war was finally resolved through the Peace of Westphalia (1648), any remaining enthusiasm for religious warfare had evaporated. People had had enough. A yearning for peace led to a new emphasis on toleration and to growing impatience with religious disputes.

The scene was set for the Enlightenment insistence that religion was to be a matter of private belief rather than state policy. In both intellectual and political circles, religion came to be viewed as a source of international and national conflict, a burden rather than a blessing. A dislike of religious fanaticism emerged, and this was easily transmuted into a dislike of religion itself.

A Letter concerning Toleration (1689), by John Locke (1632–1704), argued for the need to tolerate at least some degree of diversity in religion, as a way of preventing it becoming the basis of social conflict and instability. Locke's ideas resonated with the anti-dogmatic mood of an age that was weary of religious controversies. Locke argued for limited religious toleration on three basic grounds:

1. It is impossible for the state to adjudicate between competing religious truth claims. Locke argued that no earthly judge can be brought forward to settle such debates. For this reason, religious diversity is to be tolerated.
2. Even if it could be established that one religion were superior to all others, the legal enforcement of this religion would not lead to the desired objective of that religion.
3. The results of trying to impose religious uniformity are far worse than those which result from the continuing existence of diversity. Religious coercion leads to internal discord, or even civil war. Human reason – not religious dogma – came to be seen as the best way of resolving disputes which might otherwise lead to religious conflict.

The iconic significance of this emphasis upon reason for the eighteenth century is best seen in the frontispiece to Christian Wolff's (1679–1754) Rational Thoughts on God, the World, and the Soul (1719). This superb piece of intellectual propaganda shows a beaming, benevolent sun of reason smiling upon the world, removing clouds and shadows of superstition. A new age of reason had dawned! The darkness of earlier generations would vanish, as surely as night gives way to day! It was a powerful vision, which resonated with the hopes and fears of a war-weary Europe. Might an appeal to reason be the way to achieve social, religious, and political stability?

The Rise of the Enlightenment

The movement that has been known in English as “the Enlightenment” since the late nineteenth century is generally understood to refer to the cultural and intellectual phenomenon that emerged in eighteenth-century Europe and North America which placed an emphasis on human reason as a means of overcoming the particularism of religious belief. The origins of the Enlightenment lie partly in English Deism, a movement which developed in the late seventeenth century. Sir Isaac Newton (1643–1727) had argued that the universe was like a vast machine, rationally designed and constructed by an intelligent creator. Deism minimized the supernatural dimensions of faith and presented Christianity essentially as a rational and moral religion, easily harmonized with human reason. God was the creator of the kind of regular, ordered universe that Newtonian mechanics had uncovered. God was the “divine watchmaker,” who had created a wonderful mechanical universe which could regulate itself without further divine attention.

Many English writers began to develop approaches to religion which accepted the notion of a creator God who had implanted reason within the human soul as a basis of judgment and morality. Reason was the light of the human soul, which transcended the specifics of culture. As confidence in the power of unaided human reason began to grow, Enlightenment thinkers believed they were able to dispose of what they regarded as the unnecessary supernatural baggage of the Christian faith. A number of stages in the development of this belief may be discerned.

In the first phase of the Enlightenment, during the late seventeenth century, it was argued that the beliefs of Christianity were rational, and thus capable of standing up to critical examination. This type of approach may be found in John Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), and within some philosophical schools of thought in early eighteenth-century Germany. Christianity was a reasonable supplement to natural religion. The notion of divine revelation was thus affirmed, while any idea that it offered exclusive access to the truth was rejected.

In its second phase, it was argued that the basic ideas of Christianity, being rational, could be derived from reason itself. There was no need to invoke the idea of divine revelation. Christianity, according to John Toland (1670–1722) in his Christianity Not Mysterious (1696) and Matthew Tindal (1657–1733) in his Christianity as Old as Creation (1730), was essentially the republication of the religion of nature. It did not transcend natural religion but was merely an example of it. All so-called “revealed religion” was actually nothing other than the reconfirmation of what can be known through rational reflection on nature. “Revelation” was simply a rational reaffirmation of moral truths already available to enlightened reason.

In the final phase of this transition, which was essentially complete by the middle of the eighteenth century, leading representatives of the Enlightenment confidently affirmed the ability of reason to judge revelation. Thomas Paine's (1737–1809) Age of Reason, published in three parts between 1794 and 1807, is seen by many as a classic statement of this position. Reason and nature teach us all we need to know; any other claims to revelation or intellectual authority are to be dismissed as fraudulent forgeries.

The Enlightenment Critique of Christian Theology: Some Case Studies

The rational religion of the Enlightenment found itself in conflict with several major areas of traditional Christian theology. The following are especially important.

The Notion of Revelation

The concept of revelation was of central importance to traditional Christian theology. While many Christian theologians (such as Thomas Aquinas, c.1225–74, and John Calvin, 1509–64) recognized the possibility of a natural knowledge of God, they insisted that this required supplementation by supernatural divine revelation, such as that witnessed to in Scripture. The Enlightenment saw the development of an increasingly critical attitude to the very idea of supernatural revelation. In the first place, it was unnecessary. In the second, it lacked the universality of human reason. Everyone had access to reason; only a select few had access to revelation. The phrase “the scandal of particularity” was used by Enlightenment writers such as Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81) to express their concerns about the traditional notion of revelation at this point. How could God's revelation be limited in geographical or historical scope – for example, by being linked to the historical person of Jesus Christ?

The Status and Interpretation of the Bible

Within orthodox Christianity, whether Protestant or Catholic, the Bible was still widely regarded as a divinely inspired source of doctrine and morals, to be differentiated from other types of literature. The Enlightenment saw this assumption called into question, with the rise of the critical approach to Scripture. Developing ideas already current within Deism, the theologians of the German Enlightenment developed the thesis that the Bible was the work of many hands, at times demonstrating internal contradiction, and that it was open to precisely the same method of textual analysis and interpretation as any other piece of literature.

The Identity and Significance of Jesus Christ

A third area in which the Enlightenment made a significant challenge to orthodox Christian belief concerns the person of Jesus of Nazareth. Two particularly important developments may be noted: the origins of the “quest for the historical Jesus” (see pp. 236–41) and the rise of the “moral theory of the atonement” (pp. 266–8).

Both Deism and the German Enlightenment developed the thesis that there was a serious discrepancy between the real Jesus of history and the New Testament interpretation of his significance. Underlying the New Testament portrait of the supernatural redeemer of humanity lurked a simple human figure, a glorified teacher of common sense. While a supernatural redeemer was unacceptable to Enlightenment rationalism, the idea of an enlightened moral teacher was acceptable. Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768) and others argued that it was possible to go behind the New Testament accounts of Jesus and uncover a simpler, more human Jesus who would be acceptable to the new spirit of the age.

The second aspect of traditional ideas concerning Jesus to be challenged by Enlightenment thinkers concerned the significance of his death (an area of theology often referred to as “theories of the atonement”). Jesus's death on the cross was now reinterpreted in terms of a supreme moral example of self-giving and dedication, intended to inspire similar dedication and self-giving on the part of his followers. Where orthodox Christianity tended to treat Jesus's death (and resurrection) as possessing greater inherent importance than his religious teaching, the Enlightenment marginalized his death and denied his resurrection, in order to emphasize the quality of his moral teaching.

The doctrine of God as a Trinity – Father, Son, and Holy Spirit – was widely ridiculed by Enlightenment thinkers, who held it to be logically absurd. How could any rational person accept such mathematical nonsense? Under the pressure of rationalist criticism, many orthodox Christian thinkers de-emphasized the idea, believing that it was impossible to mount an effective defense of the doctrine, given the spirit of the age. It is important to note that the revival of the doctrine of the Trinity dates from the twentieth century, as the influence of the Enlightenment began to wane.

The Critique of Miracles

Much traditional Christian apologetics concerning the identity and significance of Jesus Christ was based upon the “miraculous evidences” of the New Testament, culminating in the resurrection. The new emphasis upon the mechanical regularity and orderliness of the universe, perhaps the most significant intellectual legacy of Newtonianism, raised doubts about the New Testament accounts of miraculous happenings – above all, the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. Essay on Miracles (1748), by David Hume (1711–76), was widely regarded as demonstrating the evidential impossibility of miracles. Hume emphasized that there were no contemporary analogs of New Testament miracles, such as the resurrection, thus forcing the New Testament reader to rely totally upon human testimony to such miracles. For Hume, it was axiomatic that no human testimony was adequate to establish the occurrence of a miracle, in the absence of a present-day analog. Similarly, the French rationalist writer Denis Diderot (1713–84) declared that, if the entire population of Paris were to assure him that a man had just been raised from the dead, he would not believe a word of it.

The Rejection of Original Sin

The idea that human nature is in some sense flawed or corrupted, expressed in the orthodox doctrine of original sin, was vigorously opposed by the Enlightenment. Leading figures of the French Enlightenment – such as Voltaire (1694–1778) and Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78) – criticized the doctrine as encouraging pessimism with regard to human abilities, thus impeding human social and political development and encouraging laissez-faire attitudes. German Enlightenment thinkers tended to criticize the doctrine on account of its relatively late historical origins in the thought of Augustine of Hippo (354–430), dating from the fourth and fifth centuries, which they regarded as debarring it from permanent validity and relevance.

The Problem of Evil

The Enlightenment witnessed a fundamental change in attitude toward the existence of evil in the world. For the medieval period, the existence of evil was not regarded as posing a threat to the coherence of Christianity. The Enlightenment saw this situation change radically: the existence of evil was now seen as a challenge to the credibility and coherence of Christian faith itself. Voltaire's novel Candide (1759) was one of many works to highlight the difficulties caused for the Christian worldview by the existence of natural evil (such as the famous Lisbon earthquake of 1755). The term “theodicy,” coined by the German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716), derives from this period, and reflects a growing recognition that the existence of evil was assuming a new significance within the Enlightenment critique of religion.

Marxism: An Intellectual Rival to Christianity

Marxism, probably one of the most significant worldviews to emerge during the modern period, had a major impact upon Christian theology during the twentieth century, especially in Latin American liberation theology and certain “theologies of hope,” such as that set out in the 1960s by Jürgen Moltmann (born 1926). It is therefore important to understand something of this movement and its implications for Christian theology.

In his 1844 political and economic manuscripts, Karl Marx (1818–83) developed the idea that religion in general (he did not distinguish between individual religions) is a direct response to social and economic conditions. “The religious world is but the reflex of the real world.” Religion is the product of social and economic alienation. It arises from that alienation, and at the same time encourages that alienation by a form of spiritual intoxication which renders the masses incapable of recognizing their situation and doing something about it. Religion is a comfort and enables people to tolerate their economic alienation. If there were no such alienation, there would be no continuing motivation for religious belief or practice.

The Russian Revolution of 1917 gave Marxism the break it so badly needed. However, although Marxism established itself in a modified form (Marxism–Leninism) within the Soviet Union, it proved unsuccessful elsewhere. Its successes in Eastern Europe after the Second World War can be put down mainly to Soviet military strength and political destabilization in the region. The economic failure and political stagnation which resulted when such countries experimented with Marxism in the 1970s and 1980s soon led to disillusionment with this new philosophy. In Europe, Marxism found itself locked into a spiral of decline. Its chief advocates increasingly became abstract theoreticians, detached from working-class roots and with virtually no political experience. The idea of a socialist revolution gradually lost its appeal and its credibility.

In the United States and Canada, Marxism had little, if any, social appeal in the first place, although its influence upon the academic world was significant from about 1970 to 1990. However, Marx's ideas have found their way, suitably modified, into some discussions in modern Christian theology. Latin American liberation theology can be shown to have drawn appreciatively on Marxist insights, even if the movement cannot really be described as “Marxist.” We shall consider liberation theology in a later section (see pp. 74–5).

Darwinism: A New Theory of Human Origins

In his Origin of Species (1859), the English naturalist Charles Darwin (1809–82) set out a new account of the origins of biological species which raised fundamental questions about some traditional Christian beliefs, especially as these were expressed in more popular contexts. Where much popular Christianity – such as that found in the writings of William Paley (1743–1805) – held that God had created all things individually in an act of special creation, Darwin proposed a vast, extended period of evolution, in which new species emerged over time.

For Paley, the complexity of nature was evidence of the existence of a designer God. For example, the intricate structure of the human eye clearly pointed to the wisdom of God as both designer and creator. Darwin's theory offered an alternative explanation of this apparent design in nature, and thus severely eroded the credibility of Paley's approach. Others, however, disagreed, arguing that Darwin had simply demonstrated the error of some forms of popular theology. More reflective forms of faith, it was argued, were not affected. For example, the influential writer Charles Kingsley (1819–75) suggested that Darwin had actually given religion a new lease of life. “We knew of old that God was so wise that he could make all things; but, behold, he is so much wiser than even that, that he can make all things make themselves.”

Although Darwin is often presented as having caused a new crisis of faith for Christianity, the historical evidence of this is much weaker than is generally appreciated. Many of the debates with which we are familiar today are more recent developments, arising from religious tensions in the United States. We shall consider some of these discussions later in this work (see pp. 350–3).

Theologically, Darwinism raised three questions of particular importance, which continue to be discussed within academic theology.

1. How are the opening chapters of the book of Genesis to be interpreted? Popular religious writers and preachers often interpreted these as literal depictions of an historical event. So what is the status of these narratives?
2. In what sense can humanity be said to be the height of God's creation, given that Darwin implied that humanity's present dominant status within nature was an historical contingency and could be eroded through further evolutionary development?

3. Darwin's reflections emphasized the wastefulness of the evolutionary process. While this did not raise any new theological issues, it gave new significance to the problem of suffering within the world.

The First World War: A Theology of Crisis

The assassination on June 28, 1914, of Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, the heir to the throne of Austro-Hungary, by a Serbian nationalist sparked an international conflict of unparalleled destructiveness. The European Great Powers were linked together by treaty obligations that virtually guaranteed that a declaration of war by one would lead to a Europe-wide conflict. The unparalleled size of the theater of conflict and the damage it inflicted were reflected in the name given to it in English-speaking lands: the “Great War.”

The end of the Great War created considerable disillusionment. Had the vast cost of the war, in terms of both material and human lives, been worth it? The impact of the First World War upon European culture cannot be overstated. The immediate postwar years were widely perceived as witnessing the final collapse of the cultural heritage of the nineteenth century, with shock waves which were felt in every sphere of intellectual and creative activity. One of the most important theological outcomes of the Great War was the “theology of crisis,” particularly associated with the Swiss Protestant theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968). Barth, who had studied theology in Germany, found himself disillusioned with the dominant approach to theology he found within liberal Protestantism. This approach to theology – often dubbed “culture Protestantism” – took its leads from cultural trends. Barth saw the Great War as having destroyed the credibility of such an approach. How could a theology which was grounded in contemporary cultural norms ever presume to criticize such cultural norms?

Barth's approach to theology, which began to develop while he was the Reformed pastor in the Swiss village of Safenwil in the aftermath of the Great War, placed an emphasis upon God's discontinuity with culture. There was, he declared, a chasm – a “glacial crevasse” – between God and human culture, which could only be bridged from God's side. Human culture could never become the basis of an authentic knowledge of God.

Picking up on a phrase from the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard, Barth argued that there is an “infinite qualitative distinction” between God and human beings. Like an Old Testament prophet, Barth emphasized God's total holiness and remoteness from humanity in general, and from human culture in particular. God “stands over and against humanity and everything human in an infinite qualitative distinction and is never, ever identical with anything which we name, experience, conceive or worship as God.”

Barth adopted a strongly iconoclastic approach to theology, rejecting any attempt to anchor God in the natural world on the one hand or in human culture on the other. God is known only as God chooses to be known – in other words, in God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ. Others followed Barth, including Friedrich Gogarten (1887–1967), who delivered a lecture on “the crisis of our culture” in 1920, emphasizing that the crisis of European civilization at that time was to be seen as an “annihilating and creative act of God” which made clear the absolute distinction between God and the world. Theology was poised between an age which had ended and an unknown new age which had yet to arrive. It was like living in an “empty room.” We shall consider some themes of this important movement later in this work (pp. 112–13, 146–7).

Postmodernism: Beyond the Modern Theological Agenda

Since the Second World War, significant cultural shifts have occurred within the west, generally involving a move away from many of the settled assumptions of the Enlightenment. Since about 1980, the term “postmodernism” has come to be widely used to designate this cultural shift. The adoption of this term is widely agreed to reflect the influence of Jean-François Lyotard's (1924–98) Postmodern

Condition (1979), the first book to present postmodernity as a distinct intellectual and cultural movement.

So what is postmodernity? And what are its implications for Christian theology? The philosophical foundations of postmodernity can be traced back to Martin Heidegger's (1889–1976) Being and Time (1927), Ludwig Wittgenstein's (1889–1951) Philosophical Investigations (1953), and Hans-Georg Gadamer's (1900–2002) Truth and Method (1960). The common feature of these works is their rejection of the need for an ultimate foundation of human knowledge by recognizing that philosophy rests upon commitments whose truth has to be assumed and cannot be demonstrated. This represented a decisive shift away from the approach of the Enlightenment, and opened up new ways of thinking about the nature of human knowledge. In doing so, it created new opportunities for Christian theology, not least by challenging such “modern” notions as the “scandal of particularity” and the demand that all beliefs had to be capable of rational demonstration.

It is helpful to think of postmodernity as being both a critique of the Enlightenment's notion of rationality and the proposal of alternatives. Lyotard argued that the “postmodern condition” was characterized by an “incredulity toward meta-narratives.” By this, he meant a growing suspicion of any “master story” that claimed to provide a comprehensive explanatory framework for everything else. Lyotard argued that the Enlightenment appeal to “narratives which subordinate, organize and account for other narratives” was partly a matter of self-justification. The Enlightenment had tried to legitimate itself by telling a story of how its thinkers overcame ignorance and superstition thanks to their appeal to reason.

These themes are echoed in many recent writings within the postmodern movement. Postmodern philosophers have raised fundamental doubts about the so-called “Enlightenment project,” which appealed to universal human reason as a neutral and disinterested perspective from which to pursue truth and justice. The idea that human reason is absolute and universal was challenged.

Metanarratives are merely narratives that have secured influence through power structures. The idea of a “truth” based on some notion of universal rationality is rejected. Reason is to be seen as a contextual and relative affair, defined in relation to the prevailing narratives and power structures of a society or institution. Metanarratives do not lead to liberation; rather, they legitimate and reinforce various forms of totalitarianism.

Linked to this is an approach to the meaning of texts which holds that it is impossible to achieve fixed or absolute meanings. Michel Foucault (1926–84), Jean Baudrillard (1929–2007), and Jacques Derrida (1930–2004) argued that language was ultimately arbitrary, whimsical, and capricious. It was not grounded in any overarching absolute linguistic laws, and was thus incapable of disclosing meaning. Baudrillard argued that modern society was trapped in an endless network of artificial sign systems which meant nothing and merely perpetuated the belief systems of those who created them.

One aspect of postmodernism which illustrates this trend particularly well, while also indicating its preoccupation with texts and language, is “deconstruction” – the critical method which virtually declares that the identity and intentions of the author of a text are an irrelevance to the interpretation of the text, prior to insisting that, in any case, no fixed meaning can be found in it. Two general principles underlie this postmodern approach to the reading of texts:

1. Anything that is written will convey meanings which its author did not intend and could not have intended.
2. The author cannot adequately put into words what he or she means in the first place.

So what are the implications of this for Christian theology? Two areas of theology were particularly affected by the “postmodern turn” in the 1980s and 1990s.

Biblical Interpretation

Traditional academic biblical interpretation had been dominated by the historico-critical method. This approach, which developed during the nineteenth century, stressed the importance of the application of critical–historical methods, such as establishing the Sitz im Leben, or “situation in life,” of gospel passages. A number of leading literary critics of the 1980s – such as Frank Kermode (1919–2010) and Harold Bloom (born 1930) – challenged such ideas as “institutionally legitimized” or “scholarly respectable” interpretations of the Bible. The notion that there is a meaning to a biblical text – whether laid down by a church authority or by the academic community – is thus regarded with considerable suspicion within postmodernism. However, the notion of an “interpretive community,” introduced by Stanley Fish (born 1938), has important implications for biblical interpretation. It emphasizes how communities form around specific ways of reading texts.

Systematic Theology

Postmodernism is, by its very nature, hostile to the notion of “systematization” or any claims to have discerned “meaning.” Mark Taylor’s (born 1945) study Erring (1984) is an excellent illustration of the impact of postmodernism on systematic theology. The image of “erring” – rather than more traditional approaches to theological system-building – leads Taylor to develop an antisystematic theology which offers polyvalent approaches to questions of truth or meaning. Taylor’s study represents an exploration of the consequences of Friedrich Nietzsche’s (1844–1900) declaration of the “death of God.” On the basis of this, Taylor argues for the elimination of such concepts as self, truth, and meaning. Language does not refer to anything, and truth does not correspond to anything.

Yet more recent reflection on these themes has indicated that Christian theology can operate more effectively within a postmodern context than these early reactions suggested. Where some see postmodernity as an oppressor, others see it as a liberator, breaking the bonds of an imprisoning Enlightenment rationalism. New categories of theological exploration have opened up – such as the rise of narrative theology, and especially the idea of theology as a “theo-drama” (Hans Urs von Balthasar, 1905–88) that locates the human situation within a narrative of God's creative and redemptive activity.

Globalization: World Christianity and World Religions

As the global expansion of Christianity continued in the modern period, Christianity became established in parts of the world in which it had previously been unknown. The spectacular growth of Christianity during the twentieth century in sub-Saharan Africa and Korea illustrates this trend, which runs counter to the western European experience of Christianity. Christianity continues to expand within southeast Asia, including mainland China. In what follows, we shall consider the development of theology in India, in which there has been a Christian theological tradition for some time, and southern Africa, in which such a tradition is still in the process of emerging.

India

Christianity became established in the Indian subcontinent at a relatively early stage. Traditionally, it is believed that the apostle Thomas founded the Indian Mar Thoma church in the first century. Even allowing for a degree of pious exaggeration here, there are excellent reasons for believing that Christianity was an indigenous element of the Indian religious scene by the fourth century. The arrival of European colonizers in India led to a significant new period in Indian Christianity, in which indigenous Christian traditions were supplemented by imported versions of the gospel, each reflecting aspects of its European context. As time went on, Dutch, English, and French settlers moved into India, bringing their own versions of Christianity with them.

Initially, evangelization was seen as peripheral to the more serious business of trading. While missionary societies and individuals were able to operate in India without any major opposition, they nevertheless received no support from the British authorities. The East India Company, for example, was opposed to their activities, on the grounds that they might create ill-will among native Indians and thus threaten the trade upon which it depended. However, the Charter Act (passed by the British parliament on July 13, 1813) gave British missionaries protected status and a limited degree of freedom to carry out evangelistic work on the Indian subcontinent. It was inevitable that religious tensions would develop. In 1830, the Dharma Sabha, a nationalist religious movement, was formed, apparently as a reaction to intrusive forms of westernization in Bengal. The uprising of 1857 (generally referred to as “the Indian Mutiny” by contemporary English writers) is often regarded as the outcome of this growing resentment of westernization.

Concern about the European origins of some forms of Christianity in the region led to the development of indigenous theologies. Keshub Chunder Sen (1838–84) developed an approach to Christian theology which rested upon the assumption that Christ brought to fulfillment all that was best in Indian religion. He argued that, although Brahman – the Ultimate Reality that lies behind the universe and all the gods – was indivisible and indescribable, it could nevertheless be considered in terms of its inner relations of Sat (“being”), Cit (“reason”), and Ananda (“bliss”). These three relations were to be correlated with the Christian understanding of God the Father as “being,” God the Son as “logos,” and God the Holy Spirit as “comforter” or “bringer of joy and love.” A related idea was developed more recently by Raimon Panikkar (1918–2010) in his Unknown Christ of Hinduism (1964), in which he argued for the hidden presence of Christ in Hindu practice, especially in relation to matters of justice and compassion.

Africa

Christianity was first brought to sub-Saharan Africa through missionaries, chiefly from England. From the outset, there was a strong association between Christianity and western interests, both commercial and political. In a famous speech at Cambridge in 1857, the British missionary David Livingstone (1818–73) declared his intention to return to Africa to “make an open path for commerce and Christianity.” Most European missionaries had little knowledge of African culture and as a result were often insensitive to the local situation, failing to realize the importance of interacting with local belief systems. As a result, “African theology” was simply European theology carried out on African soil, without any real interaction with the local culture.

As Africa began to emerge from its colonial past in the 1960s and 1970s, there was increasing interest in the reappropriation of African culture and values, which had been suppressed by the European colonial powers. One of the most important developments since the 1970s has been the emergence of indigenous African Christian theologians, such as the Kenyan John Mbiti (born 1931), the Tanzanian Charles Nyamiti (born 1931), and the Ghanaian Kwame Bediako (1945–2008), who are concerned to develop authentically African theological paradigms rather than depend on western theological norms. Nyamiti's Christ as Our Ancestor (1984) is a good example of a Christian theological work which takes traditional African religious views seriously, exploiting their apologetic potential and Christianizing them from within.

The interaction with traditional African culture and religions is thus of foundational importance in southern Africa. Yet, in the recent past, the agenda of Christian theology in southern Africa has tended to be dominated by interaction with an ideology – apartheid (an Afrikaaner word meaning “separateness”) – which enforced racial segregation in South Africa during the period of white domination. For many years, the theological agenda of southern Africa was virtually confined to this single issue, arguing for the total unacceptability of the ideology on theological grounds. This trend was encouraged by western theologians, who were able to understand the theological interaction with apartheid in terms similar to those of liberation theology – that is, the struggle for freedom and justice. Yet, with the ending of apartheid in the early 1990s, Christian theology is now able to return to an engagement with the more traditional task of interacting with local African cultures.

Globalization and western Christian theology

Globalization has had a significant impact on western theology. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, most Christian theologians gained their experience and understanding of other religions from periods spent in service abroad – such as British colonial administrators and educationalists who worked in India. Some of the most important Christian reflections on the relationship between Christianity and other faiths emerged through theologians from religiously monochrome cultures – such as the United States, Great Britain, and Germany – immersing themselves in non-Christian cultures.

In recent decades, mass migration from Buddhist, Hindu, and Islamic nations to the west has led to the erosion of Christianity's religious monopoly in the west and given rise to multicultural communities in which other faiths are a significant living presence in the west. This has raised significant questions for Christian churches in these regions. How should they show hospitality to these communities? It has also given a new force and context for traditional questions of Christian theology. In what way can the Christian faith intellectually accommodate the existence of other faiths? What questions are raised for Christian apologetics and evangelism? One point of importance here is that Christian history makes it clear that theology often develops through an encounter with the “other” – with a worldview or religion that poses a significant challenge. This can be seen in the Christian dialogue with Platonism in the patristic age and with Marxism in the twentieth century. Dialogue with other faiths may well hold the same promise.

A number of examples will illustrate the theological importance of these points. The British theologian John Hick (1922–2012) developed his theology of “religious pluralism” as a result of his experience in the British city of Birmingham, which became home to large numbers of Hindus and Muslims from the Indian subcontinent during the 1970s. Hick's approach attempted to provide a theological framework in which each religion could be seen as a distinct and equally legitimate way of seeing “ultimate reality.” Although the intellectual coherence of this “pluralist” approach has been widely criticized (see p. 424), it became highly influential in liberal religious circles in the final decade of the twentieth century.

Other academics began to realize the importance of meeting believers from across religious divides to read and discuss passages from their sacred texts. The Society for Scriptural Reasoning was founded in 1995 by the Christian theologian David F. Ford (born 1948) and the Jewish scholar Peter Ochs (born 1950). Unlike Hick's homogenizing approach, “scriptural reasoning” recognizes that Judaism, Christianity, and Islam understand the status, authority, and character of their sacred texts in different ways which do not command consensus across the religious traditions. The process leads to deeper understanding, not necessarily to any form of consensus or agreement on the themes being explored.

Other examples could easily be given to illustrate how Christian theology is responding to this changing cultural situation. Pope Francis's (born 1936) Evangelii Gaudium (“The Joy of the Gospel”), a papal exhortation delivered at St. Peter's, Rome, in November 2013, is a good example of a recent theological document which affirms the importance of dialogue between faiths, both as a means of reducing tension between them and as a means of clarifying the distinctiveness of the Christian faith.

Key Theologians

A close study of works dealing with theology during the past two hundred years demonstrates that a relatively small group of theologians are regularly cited as representing theological benchmarks. Those who feel that theology has been dominated by white European males will, I fear, find many of their concerns confirmed by this observation. It is my hope that this situation will change, and that new names will secure increasing recognition as time passes, so that future editions of this work can respond accordingly.

The purpose of this present section is to introduce the names and agendas of the theologians who have had a significant impact in this most recent period of theological reflection. Although many will be discussed in greater detail elsewhere in this volume, readers will find these brief introductions helpful in orienting themselves within the complex landscape of modern theology.

F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834)

Friedrich Daniel Ernst Schleiermacher is widely regarded as the most important Protestant theologian of the nineteenth century. He rose to fame through his recognition of the need to make Christianity relevant and accessible to its “cultured despisers” within the Enlightenment movement. His Christian Faith (1821–2, revised edition 1830–1) set out a systematic approach to Christian theology, based on an appeal to the “experience of absolute dependence.” Although widely respected for his contributions to the interpretation and criticism of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), and his work on hermeneutics, Schleiermacher is best seen as a theologian who laid the intellectual foundations for the rise of liberal Protestantism in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

John Henry Newman (1801–90)

Few English-language theologians have had such an impact as John Henry Newman. Newman studied at Oxford University and went on to become vicar of the University Church, Oxford. He became a leading figure in the Oxford Movement, which sought to renew the high-church tradition within Anglicanism. In 1845, he was received into the Catholic church, becoming a cardinal in 1879.

Although Newman wrote several works of historical theology, these do not show him at his best, and often rest on questionable judgments. His most important work concerned the development of doctrine (see his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, 1845) and the clarification of the relationship between faith and reason (see especially his Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, 1870).

Karl Barth (1886–1968)

The Swiss writer Karl Barth is now virtually universally regarded as the greatest Protestant theologian of the twentieth century, and possibly since the Reformation. Initially brought up within the context of liberal Protestantism, Barth placed an emphasis on divine revelation, which forced a re-evaluation of much existing theology. The style of theology associated with Barth was initially termed “dialectical theology” or “neo-orthodoxy,” although neither label is particularly helpful in understanding his theological agenda. For Barth, theology was an autonomous discipline whose task was to respond to what it found in God's self-revelation.

Although Barth's early writings are often critical, rather than constructive (such as his famous Romans commentary of 1919), his Church Dogmatics (incomplete at the time of his death) is a positive, constructive presentation of his theological program. Barth has had a major impact on many areas of theology, particularly in relation to the concept of revelation. The twentieth-century renaissance of trinitarian theology is widely put down to his influence.

Paul Tillich (1886–1965)

Paul Tillich originally studied theology in Germany, but he was forced to resign his teaching positions due to his opposition to Nazism. He emigrated to the United States and initially taught at Union Theological Seminary, New York, before accepting a position at Harvard University. He became an American citizen in 1940. Tillich can be seen as continuing and extending the theological program of F. D. E. Schleiermacher. His theological agenda can be summarized as an attempt to correlate culture and faith in such a way that “faith need not be unacceptable to contemporary culture and contemporary culture need not be unacceptable to faith.” Making extensive use of existentialism, Tillich set out to present and interpret the Christian faith to modern western culture, stressing the “correlation” between the “ultimate questions” of humanity and the answers provided by the Christian faith. Although this approach is clearly set out in works such as The Shaking of the Foundations (1948), it is best studied from his major work, Systematic Theology (1951–63).

Karl Rahner (1904–84)

Of the many Catholic theologians to rise to prominence during the twentieth century, the German writer Karl Rahner, a member of the Society of Jesus, is generally regarded as the most significant. One of Rahner's most impressive achievements is the rehabilitation of the essay as a tool of theological exploration. The most significant source for Rahner's thought is not a substantial work of dogmatic theology but a relatively loose and unstructured collection of essays published over the period 1954–84, and known in English as Theological Investigations. These essays show how a relatively unsystematic approach to theology can nevertheless give rise to a coherent theological program. Perhaps the most important aspect of Rahner's theological program is his “transcendental method,” which he saw as a Christian response to the secular loss of the transcendence of God. Whereas earlier generations attempted to meet this challenge through liberal or modernist accommodationist strategies, Rahner argued that the recovery of a sense of the transcendent could only be achieved through a reappropriation of the classical sources of Christian theology, especially Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. Rahner's particular approach involves the fusion of Thomism with central aspects of German idealism and existentialism.

Hans Urs Von Balthasar (1905–88)

The Swiss Catholic theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar has had a major impact on recent theological debate, especially in relation to questions of beauty. Balthasar's chief work, published over the period 1961–9, is entitled The Glory of the Lord. It sets out the idea of Christianity as a response to God's self-revelation, laying special emphasis upon the notion of faith as a response to the vision of the beauty of the Lord. His analysis of theology in terms of contemplation of the good, the beautiful, and the true has won many admirers. Other major works include his Theo-Drama: Theological Dramatic Theory (1971–83), a five-volume work on what he terms “theodramatics” – the action of God and the human response – seen especially in the events of Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter

Day; and his Theo-Logic (1985–7), which deals with the relationship of Jesus Christ to reality itself.

Jürgen Moltmann (born 1926)

The German Protestant theologian Jürgen Moltmann developed his interest in theology during his time spent in a prisoner-of-war camp near Nottingham, England, where he recalls reading Reinhold Niebuhr's (1892–1971) landmark work The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941). After returning to Germany, Moltmann began his career as a theologian. The work which brought him to international attention was his trilogy, The Theology of Hope (1964), The Crucified God (1972), and The Church in the Power of the Spirit (1975). In the first of these, Moltmann addressed the question of hope in dialogue with the Marxist writer Ernst Bloch (1885–1977). The Crucified God explored the relevance of Christ to a suffering world, and developed a pioneering approach to the notion of “a suffering God.” Although Moltmann has subsequently made landmark contributions to other areas of theology (especially the doctrine of creation, the doctrine of the Trinity, and ecological issues), he is still chiefly remembered for these earlier works.

Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–2014)

The German Protestant theologian Wolfhart Pannenberg rose to prominence during the 1960s on account of his work on “revelation as history.” This approach to theology argued that revelation could be discerned within the historical process itself. For Pannenberg, God conducts his self-disclosure through his actions, primarily in the history of Israel and in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Developing this theme in Jesus – God and Man (1968), Pannenberg pointed to the resurrection of Christ as providing the vantage point from which history could be properly interpreted. Pannenberg's interests include questions of theological method (best seen in his early work, Theology and the Philosophy of Science, 1977), which have more recently been extended to include an important discussion of the interaction of Christian theology and the natural sciences. The definitive statement of his mature theology is to be seen in his Systematic Theology (1988–93).

Major Modern Theological Movements

In previous sections of this chapter, we have looked at some of the broader cultural influences on Christian theology in the modern era, as well as noting some denominational issues. In what follows, we shall explore several major movements which emerged within western theology during the modern period. Pressure on space limits us to looking only at eight major movements; others will be noted briefly later in this volume.

Liberal Protestantism

Liberal Protestantism is unquestionably one of the most important movements to have arisen within modern Christian thought. Its origins are complex. However, it is helpful to think of it as having arisen in response to the theological program set out by F. D. E.

Schleiermacher, especially in relation to his emphasis upon human “feeling” (see p. 67) and the need to relate Christian faith to the human situation. Liberal Protestant writers argued that reconstruction of belief was essential if Christianity were to remain a serious intellectual option in the modern world. For this reason, they demanded a degree of freedom in relation to the doctrinal inheritance of Christianity, on the one hand, and traditional methods of biblical interpretation, on the other. Where traditional ways of interpreting Scripture, or traditional beliefs, seemed to be compromised by developments in human knowledge, it was imperative that they should be discarded or reinterpreted to bring them into line with what was now known about the world.

The theological implications of this shift in direction were considerable. A number of Christian beliefs came to be regarded as seriously out of line with modern cultural norms. These were dealt with in one of two ways:

1. They were abandoned, as resting upon outdated or mistaken presuppositions. The doctrine of original sin is a case in point; this was put down to a misreading of the New Testament in the light of the writings of Augustine, whose judgment on these matters had become clouded by his over-involvement with a fatalist sect (the Manichees).
2. They were reinterpreted, in a manner more conducive to the spirit of the age. A number of central doctrines relating to the person of Jesus Christ may be included in this category, including his divinity (which was reinterpreted as an affirmation of Jesus exemplifying qualities which humanity as a whole could hope to emulate).

Alongside this process of doctrinal reinterpretation (which continued in the “history of dogma” movement: see pp. 181–2) may be seen a new concern to ground Christian faith in the world of humanity – above all, in human experience and modern culture. Sensing potential difficulties in grounding Christian faith in an exclusive appeal to Scripture or the person of Jesus Christ, liberalism sought to anchor that faith in common human experience, and interpret it in ways that made sense within the modern worldview.

Liberalism was inspired by the vision of a humanity which was ascending upward into new realms of progress and prosperity. The doctrine of evolution gave new vitality to this belief, which was nurtured by strong evidence of cultural stability and progress in western Europe in the late nineteenth century. Religion came increasingly to be seen as relating to the spiritual needs of modern humanity and giving ethical guidance to society.

Many critics of the movement – such as Karl Barth in Europe and Reinhold Niebuhr in North America – regarded liberal Protestantism as based upon an unduly optimistic view of human nature. They believed that this optimism had been discredited by the events of the First World War, and that liberalism would henceforth lack cultural credibility. This has proved to be a considerable misjudgment. At its best, liberalism may be regarded as a movement committed to the restatement of Christian faith in forms which are acceptable within contemporary culture. Liberalism has continued to see itself as a mediator between two unacceptable alternatives: the mere restatement of traditional Christian faith (usually described as “traditionalism” or “fundamentalism” by its liberal critics) and the total rejection of Christianity. Liberal writers have been passionately committed to the search for a middle road between these two stark alternatives.

Perhaps the most developed and influential presentation of liberal Protestantism is to be found in the writings of the German émigré Paul Tillich, who is widely regarded as one of the most influential recent American theologians. Tillich's theological program involved what he called the “method of correlation.” For Tillich, existential questions – or “ultimate questions,” as he often termed them – are thrown up and revealed by human culture. Modern philosophy, writing, and the creative arts point to questions which concern humans. Theology then formulates answers to these questions, and by doing so it correlates the gospel to modern culture. The gospel must speak to culture, and it can do so only if the actual questions raised by that culture are heard.

The term “liberal” is thus probably best interpreted as designating “a theologian in the tradition of Schleiermacher and Tillich, concerned with the reconstruction of belief in response to contemporary culture” (David Tracy), in which form it describes many distinguished modern writers. However, it must be noted that the current use of the term “liberal” is somewhat imprecise and confusing.

Liberal Protestantism has been criticized on a number of points, of which the following are representative.

1. It tends to place considerable weight upon the notion of a universal human religious experience. Yet this is a vague and ill-defined notion, incapable of being examined and assessed publicly. There are also excellent reasons for suggesting that “experience” is shaped by interpretation to a far greater extent than liberalism allows.

2. Liberalism is seen by its critics as placing too great an emphasis upon transient cultural developments, with the result that it often appears to be uncritically driven by a secular agenda.
3. It has been suggested that liberalism is too ready to surrender distinctive Christian doctrines in an effort to become acceptable to contemporary culture.

Liberalism probably reached its zenith in North America during the late 1970s and early 1980s. Although it continues to maintain a distinguished presence in seminaries and schools of religion, cultural changes during the 1990s have led some to see it as a waning force both in modern theology and in church life in general. The weaknesses of liberalism have been seized upon by critics within the postliberal school, to be considered shortly. Much the same criticism can also be directed against a movement known loosely as “modernism,” to which we now turn.

Modernism

The term “modernist” was first used to refer to a school of Catholic theologians operating toward the end of the nineteenth century. They adopted a critical attitude to traditional Christian doctrines, especially those relating to the identity and significance of Jesus of Nazareth. The movement fostered a positive attitude toward radical biblical criticism, and stressed the ethical, rather than the more theological, dimensions of faith. In many ways, modernism may be seen as an attempt by writers within the Catholic church to come to terms with the outlook of the Enlightenment, which it had, until that point, largely ignored.

Among Catholic modernist writers, particular attention should be paid to Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) and George Tyrrell (1861–1909). During the 1890s, Loisy established himself as a critic of traditional views of the biblical accounts of creation, and argued that a real development of doctrine could be discerned within Scripture. His most significant publication, The Gospel and the Church, appeared in 1902. This important work was a direct response to the views of Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930), published two years earlier as What is Christianity?, on the origins and nature of Christianity. Loisy rejected Harnack's suggestion that there was a radical discontinuity between Jesus and the church; however, he made significant concessions to Harnack's liberal Protestant account of Christian origins, including an acceptance of the role and validity of biblical criticism in interpreting the gospels. As a result, the work was placed upon the list of prohibited books by the Catholic authorities in 1903.

The British Jesuit writer George Tyrrell followed Loisy in his radical criticism of traditional Catholic dogma. In common with Loisy, he criticized Harnack's account of Christian origins in Christianity at the Cross-Roads (1909), famously dismissing Harnack's historical reconstruction of Jesus as “the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face, seen at the bottom of a deep well.” The book also included a defense of Loisy's work, arguing that the official Catholic hostility to the book and its author had created a general impression that it was a defense of liberal Protestant against Catholic positions, and that “modernism is simply a protestantizing and rationalizing movement.”

In part, this perception may have been due to the growing influence of similar modernist attitudes within the mainstream Protestant denominations. In England, the Churchmen's Union was founded in 1898 for the advancement of liberal religious thought; in 1928, it altered its name to the Modern Churchmen's Union; in 1986, to the Modern Churchpeople's Union; and in 2010 to Modern Church. Among those especially associated with this group may be noted Hastings Rashdall (1858–1924), whose Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology (1919) argued that the moral or exemplarist theory of the atonement associated with the medieval writer Peter Abelard (1079–1142) was more acceptable to modern forms of thought than traditional theories which made an appeal to the notion of a substitutionary sacrifice. Nevertheless, the events of the First World War, and the subsequent rise of fascism in Europe in the 1930s, undermined the credibility of the movement. It was not until the 1960s that a renewed modernism or radicalism became a significant feature of English Christianity.

The rise of modernism in the United States followed a similar pattern. The growth of liberal Protestantism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was widely perceived as a direct challenge to more conservative evangelical standpoints. Newman Smyth (1843–1925) argued in his Passing Protestantism and Coming Catholicism (1908) that Catholic modernism could serve as a mentor to American Protestantism in several ways, not least in its critique of dogma and its historical understanding of the development of doctrine. The situation became increasingly polarized through the rise of fundamentalism in response to modernist attitudes.

The First World War ushered in a period of self-questioning within American modernism which was intensified through the radical social realism of writers such as H. Richard Niebuhr. By the mid-1930s, modernism appeared to have lost its way. In an influential article in The Christian Century of December 4, 1935, Harry Emerson Fosdick (1878–1969) declared the need “to go beyond modernism.” In his Realistic Theology (1934), Walter Marshall Horton spoke of the rout of liberal forces in American theology. However, the movement gained new confidence in the postwar period, and arguably reached its zenith during the period of the Vietnam War.

However, we must now turn back to the opening of the twentieth century to consider an earlier reaction against liberalism, which is especially associated with Karl Barth: neo-orthodoxy.

Neo-Orthodoxy

The First World War witnessed a growing disillusionment with, although not a final rejection of, the liberal theology that had come to be associated with Schleiermacher and his followers. A number of writers argued that Schleiermacher had made Christianity a human-centered rather than a God-centered affair. The trauma and horrors of war, it was argued, destroyed the credibility of any approach to theology which appealed to human cultural norms. Liberal theology seemed to be about human values – and how could these be taken seriously, if they led to global conflicts on such a massive scale? By stressing the “otherness” of God, writers such as Karl Barth believed that they could escape from the tainted human-centered theology of liberalism.

These ideas were given systematic exposition by Barth in Church Dogmatics (1936–69), one of the most significant theological achievements of the twentieth century. Barth did not live to finish this enterprise, so his exposition of the doctrine of redemption is incomplete. The primary theme which resonates throughout the Dogmatics is the need to take seriously the self-revelation of God in Christ through Scripture. Although this might seem to be little more than a reiteration of themes already firmly associated with Calvin or Martin Luther (1483–1546), Barth brought a degree of creativity and rigor to his task which firmly established him as a major thinker in his own right.

The work is divided into five volumes, each of which is further subdivided. Volume one deals with the Word of God – for Barth, the source and starting point of Christian faith and Christian theology alike. Volume two deals with the doctrine of God, and volume three with the doctrine of the creation. Volume four deals with the doctrine of reconciliation (or, perhaps one might say, “atonement”; the German term Versöhnung has both meanings). The final incomplete volume (five) considers the doctrine of redemption.

Apart from the predictable (and relatively uninformative) term “Barthianism,” two terms have been used to describe the approach associated with Barth. The first of these terms is “dialectical theology,” which takes up the idea, found especially in Barth's 1919 commentary on Romans, of a “dialectic between time and eternity” or a “dialectic between God and humanity.” The term draws attention to Barth's characteristic insistence that there is a contradiction or dialectic, rather than a continuity, between God and humanity. The second term is “neo-orthodoxy,” which draws attention to the affinity between Barth and the writings of the period of Reformed orthodoxy, especially during the seventeenth century. In many ways, Barth can be regarded as entering into dialogue with several leading Reformed writers of this period.

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of Barth's approach is his “theology of the Word of God.” According to Barth, theology is a discipline which seeks to keep the proclamation of the Christian church faithful to its foundation in Jesus Christ, as he has been revealed to us in Scripture. Theology is not a response to the human situation or to human questions; it is a response to the Word of God, which demands a response on account of its intrinsic nature.

Neo-orthodoxy became a significant presence in North American theology during the 1930s, especially through the writings of Reinhold Niebuhr and others, which criticized the optimistic assumptions of much liberal Protestant social thinking of the time.

Neo-orthodoxy has been criticized on a number of points. The following are of especial importance:

1. Neo-orthodoxy's emphasis upon the transcendence and "otherness" of God leads to God being viewed as distant and potentially irrelevant. It has often been suggested that this leads to extreme skepticism.
2. There is a certain circularity to the claim of neo-orthodoxy to be based only upon divine revelation, in that this cannot be tested by anything other than an appeal to that same revelation. In other words, there are no recognized external reference points by which neo-orthodoxy's truth claims can be verified. This has led many of its critics to suggest that it is a form of "fideism" – that is to say, a belief system which is impervious to any criticism from outside its own boundaries.
3. Neo-orthodoxy has no helpful response to those who are attracted to other religions, which it is obliged to dismiss as distortions and perversions. Other theological approaches are able to account for the existence of such religions and place them in relation to the Christian faith.

Liberation Theologies

The term "liberation theology" is used to refer to a family of theologies which arise within socially or politically marginalized communities, providing the basis for religious and social empowerment. Many see "black theology" – most famously expressed in the writings of James H. Cone (born 1938), particularly his Black Theology of Liberation (1970) – as an excellent example of this kind of movement.

The term is, however, most widely used to refer to the distinct form of theology which has its origins in the Latin American situation of the 1960s and 1970s. The origins of this movement are usually traced back to 1968, when the Catholic bishops of Latin America gathered for a congress at Medellín, Colombia. This meeting – often known as CELAM II – sent shock waves throughout the region by acknowledging that the church had often sided with oppressive governments in the region and declaring that in the future it would be on the side of the poor.

This pastoral and political stance was soon complemented by a solid theological foundation. In his Theology of Liberation (1971), the Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez (born 1928) introduced the characteristic themes that would become definitive of the movement, and which we shall explore presently. Other writers of note include the Brazilian Leonardo Boff (born 1938), the Uruguayan Juan Luis Segundo (1925–96), and the Argentinian José Miguéz Bonino (born 1924). This last is unusual in the respect that he is a Protestant (more precisely, a Methodist) voice in a conversation dominated by Catholic writers.

The basic themes of Latin American liberation theology may be summarized as follows:

1. Liberation theology is oriented toward the poor and oppressed.
“The poor are the authentic theological source for understanding Christian truth and practice” (Jon Sobrino, born 1938). In the Latin American situation, the church is on the side of the poor: “God is clearly and unequivocally on the side of the poor” (Bonino). The fact that God is on the side of the poor leads to a further insight: the poor occupy a position of especial importance in the interpretation of the Christian faith. All Christian theology and missions must begin with the “view from below,” with the sufferings and distress of the poor.

2. Liberation theology involves critical reflection on practice. As Gutiérrez puts it, theology is a “critical reflection on Christian praxis in the light of the word of God.” Theology is not, and should not be, detached from social involvement or political action. Whereas classical western theology regarded action as the result of reflection, liberation theology inverts the order: action comes first, followed by critical reflection. “Theology has to stop explaining the world, and start transforming it” (Bonino). True knowledge of God can never be disinterested or detached, but comes in and through commitment to the cause of the poor. There is a fundamental rejection of the Enlightenment view that commitment is a barrier to knowledge.

This last point has caused debate on account of the movement's apparent indebtedness to Marxist theory. Liberation theologians have defended their use of Marx on two grounds. First, Marxism is seen as a “tool of social analysis” (Gutiérrez), which allows insights to be gained concerning the present state of Latin American society and the means by which the appalling situation of the poor may be remedied. Second, it provides a political program by which the present unjust social system may be dismantled and a more equitable society created. In practice, liberation theology is intensely critical of capitalism and affirmative of socialism. Liberation theologians have noted Thomas Aquinas's use of Aristotle in his theological method, and argued that they are merely doing the same thing – using a secular philosopher to give substance to fundamentally Christian beliefs. For, it must be stressed, liberation theology declares that God's preference for and commitment to the poor is a fundamental aspect of the gospel, not some bolt-on option arising from the Latin American situation or based purely in Marxist political theory.

It will be clear that liberation theology is of major significance to recent theological debate. Two key theological issues may be considered as an illustration of its impact.

Biblical Hermeneutics

Scripture is read as a narrative of liberation. Particular emphasis is laid upon the liberation of Israel from bondage in Egypt, the prophets' denunciation of oppression, and Jesus's proclamation of the gospel to the poor and outcast. Scripture is read not from a standpoint of wishing to understand the gospel but out of a concern to apply its liberating insights to the Latin American situation. Western academic theology has tended to regard this approach with some impatience, believing that it has no place for the considered insights of biblical scholarship concerning the interpretation of such passages.

The Nature of Salvation \(see also p. 274\)

Liberation theology has tended to equate salvation with liberation, and stressed the social, political, and economic aspects of salvation. The movement has laid particular emphasis upon the notion of “structural sin,” noting that it is society, rather than individuals, that is corrupted and requires redemption. To its critics, liberation theology has reduced salvation to a purely worldly affair, and neglected its transcendent and eternal dimensions.

Feminism

Feminism has come to be a significant component of modern western culture. At its heart, feminism is a global movement that works toward the emancipation of women, arguing for gender equality and for a right understanding of the relationship between women and men to be affirmed by contemporary theology and practice. The older term for the movement – “women's liberation” – expressed the fact that it is at heart a liberation movement, directing its efforts toward achieving equality for women in modern society, especially through the removal of obstacles – including beliefs, values, and attitudes – which hinder that process.

Feminist theology thus aims to understand and criticize male-dominated tradition and to challenge androcentric images of God and humanity through the revision of traditional theological language and imagery. The movement has become increasingly heterogeneous in recent years, partly on account of a willingness to recognize a diversity of women's approaches within different cultures and ethnic groupings. Thus, the religious writings of black women in North America are increasingly coming to be referred to as "black womanist theology."

Feminism has come into conflict with Christianity (as it has with most religions) on account of the perception that religions treat women as second-rate human beings, both in terms of the roles that those religions allocate to women and the manner in which they are understood to image God. The writings of Simone de Beauvoir (1908–86) – such as The Second Sex (1945) – developed such ideas at length. A number of post-Christian feminists, including Mary Daly (1928–2010) in her Beyond God the Father (1973) and Daphne Hampson (born 1944) in Theology and Feminism (1990), argue that Christianity, with its male symbols for God, its male savior figure, and its long history of male leaders and thinkers, is biased against women and therefore incapable of being salvaged. Women, they urge, should leave its oppressive environment. Others, such as Carol Christ (born 1945) in Laughter of Aphrodite (1987) and Naomi Ruth Goldenberg in Changing of the Gods (1979), argue that women may find religious emancipation by recovering the ancient goddess religions (or inventing new ones), and abandoning traditional Christianity altogether.

Yet the feminist evaluation of Christianity is not as monolithically hostile toward Christianity as these writers might suggest. Feminist writers have stressed how women have been active in the shaping and development of the Christian tradition, from the New Testament onward, and have exercised significant leadership roles throughout Christian history. Indeed, many feminist writers have shown the need to reappraise the Christian past, giving honor and recognition to a large group of faithful women whose practice, defense, and proclamation of their faith had hitherto passed unnoticed by much of the Christian church and its (mainly male) historians. Sarah Coakley (born 1951) is an important voice in such discussions. In her Powers and Submissions (2002), Coakley explores how feminism can be used constructively to provide a new appreciation of certain early church figures, without losing sight of its critical and corrective role.

The most significant contribution of feminism to Christian thought may be argued to lie in its challenge to traditional theological formulations. These, it is argued, are often patriarchal (that is, they reflect a belief in domination by males) and sexist (that is, they are biased against women). The following areas of theology are especially significant in this respect.

The Maleness of God (see also pp. 175–7)

The persistent use of male pronouns for God within the Christian tradition is a target of criticism by many feminist writers. It is argued that the use of female pronouns is at least as logical as the use of their male counterparts, and might go some way toward correcting an excessive emphasis upon male role models for God. In her Sexism and God-Talk (1983), Rosemary Radford Ruether (born 1936) suggested that the term “God/ess” is a politically correct designation for God, although the verbal clumsiness of the term is unlikely to enhance its appeal.

In her Metaphorical Theology (1982), Sallie McFague (born 1933) argues for the need to recover the idea of the metaphorical aspects of male models of God, such as “father”: analogies tend to stress the similarities between God and human beings; metaphors affirm that, amid these similarities, there are significant dissimilarities between God and humans (e.g., in the realm of gender).

The Nature of Sin

Many feminist writers have suggested that notions of sin such as pride, ambition, or excessive self-esteem are fundamentally male in orientation. This, it is argued, does not correspond to the experience of women, who tend to experience sin as lack of pride, lack of ambition, and lack of self-esteem. Of particular importance in this context is the feminist appeal to the notion of noncompetitive relationships, which avoids the patterns of low self-esteem and passivity which have been characteristic of traditional female responses to male-dominated society. This point is made with particular force by Judith Plaskow (born 1947) in Sex, Sin and Grace (1980), a penetrating critique of Reinhold Niebuhr's theology from a feminist perspective.

The Person of Christ \(See Also pp. 269–70\)

A number of feminist writers, most notably Rosemary Radford Ruether in Sexism and God-Talk, have suggested that Christology is the ultimate ground of much sexism within Christianity. In her Consider Jesus: Waves of Renewal in Christology (1990), Elizabeth Johnson (born 1941) has explored the manner in which the maleness of Jesus has been the subject of theological abuse, and suggests appropriate correctives. Two areas of especial importance may be noted.

First, the maleness of Christ has sometimes been used as the theological foundation for the belief that only the male human may adequately image God, or that only males provide appropriate role models or analogies for God. Second, the maleness of Christ has sometimes been used as the foundation for a network of beliefs concerning norms within humanity. It has been argued, on the basis of the maleness of Christ, that the norm of humanity is the male, with the female being somehow a second-rate, or less than ideal, human being. Thomas Aquinas, who describes women as misbegotten males (apparently on the basis of an obsolete Aristotelian biology), illustrates this trend, which has important implications for issues of leadership within the church.

In responding to these points, feminist writers have argued that the maleness of Christ is a contingent aspect of his identity, on the same level as his being Jewish. It is a contingent element of his historical reality, not an essential aspect of his identity. Thus, it cannot be allowed to become the basis of the domination of females by males, any more than it legitimates the domination of Gentiles by Jews, or plumbers by carpenters.

The relevance of the feminist critique of traditional theology will be noted at appropriate points during the course of this volume. Yet feminism itself has been criticized for its “Eurocentrism,” as we shall see when we consider the rise of “womanist theology.”

Black and “Womanist” Theology

“Black theology” is the preferred term to refer to the movement which emerged in the United States during the 1960s and 1970s which concerned itself with ensuring that the realities of black experience were represented at the theological level. The first major evidence of the move toward theological emancipation within the American black community dates from 1964, with the publication of Joseph Washington's Black Religion, a powerful affirmation of the distinctiveness of black religion within the North American context. Washington emphasized the need for integration and assimilation of black theological insights within mainstream Protestantism; however, this approach was largely swept to one side with the appearance of Albert Cleage's Black Messiah (1968). Cleage (1911–2000), pastor of the Shrine of the Black Madonna in Detroit, urged black people to liberate themselves from white theological oppression. Arguing that Scripture was written by black Jews, Cleage claimed that the gospel of a black Messiah had been perverted by Paul in his attempt to make it acceptable to Europeans. Despite the considerable overstatements within the work, Black Messiah came to be a rallying point for black Christians determined to discover and assert their distinctive identity.

The movement made several decisive affirmations of its theological distinctiveness during 1969. The “Black Manifesto” issued at the Inter-Religious Foundation for Community Organization meeting in Detroit, Michigan, placed the issue of the black experience firmly on the theological agenda.

The most significant writer within the movement is generally agreed to be James Hal Cone, whose Black Theology of Liberation (1970) appealed to the central notion of a God who is concerned for the black struggle for liberation. Noting the strong preference of Jesus for the oppressed, Cone argued that “God was black” – that is, identified with the oppressed. However, Cone's use of Barthian categories was criticized: why, it was asked, should a black theologian use the categories of a white theology in articulating the black experience? Why had he not made fuller use of black history and culture? In later works, Cone responded to such criticisms by making a more pervasive appeal to “the black experience” as a central resource in black theology. Nevertheless, Cone has continued to maintain a Barthian emphasis upon the centrality of Christ as the self-revelation of God (while identifying him as “the black Messiah”), and the authority of Scripture in interpreting human experience in general.

More recently, a trend has developed within black theology to emphasize the distinctiveness of the experience and insights of African-American women. The term “womanist,” first used in a collection of essays by Alice Walker (born 1944), best known for her novel The Color Purple (1982), which tells the story of a young black woman struggling against a racist white culture and a patriarchal black culture. Representatives of this school include Jacquelyn Grant and Delores Williams. Grant's White Woman's Christ and Black Women's Jesus (1989) notes that white feminist theologians are eurocentric, and fail to do justice to women from other ethnic backgrounds, whereas black theology has been dominated by males. As a result, she suggests, “Black women have been invisible in theology including black theology and feminist theology.”

Postliberalism

Postliberalism is a form of theology which emerged around 1980, reflecting a growing skepticism over the plausibility of a liberal Protestant worldview (pp. 70–1). The movement had its origins in the United States, and was initially associated with Yale Divinity School and particularly with theologians such as Paul Holmer (1916–2004), Hans Frei (1922–88), and George Lindbeck (born 1923). Since then, postliberal trends have become well established within North American and British academic theology. Postliberalism's central foundations are narrative approaches to theology, such as those developed by Hans Frei, and schools of social interpretation that stress the importance of culture and language in the generation and interpretation of experience and thought.

Building upon the work of philosophers such as Alasdair MacIntyre (born 1929), postliberalism rejects both the traditional Enlightenment appeal to a “universal rationality” and the liberal assumption of an immediate religious experience common to all humanity. Arguing that all thought and experience are historically and socially mediated, postliberalism bases its theological program upon a return to religious traditions, whose values are inwardly appropriated. Postliberalism is thus antifoundational (in that it rejects the notion of a universal foundation of knowledge), communitarian (in that it appeals to the values, experiences, and language of a community, rather than prioritizing the individual), and historicist (in that it insists upon the importance of traditions and their associated historical communities in the shaping of experience and thought).

The philosophical roots of this movement are complex. Within the movement, particular appreciation can be discerned for the style of approach associated with the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, as noted above, which places an emphasis on the relationship between narrative, community, and the moral life. In this respect, postliberalism reintroduces a strong emphasis on the particularity of the Christian faith, in reaction to the strongly homogenizing tendencies of liberalism, in its abortive attempt to make theory (that all religions are saying the same thing) and observation (that the religions are different) coincide.

Liberal critics of postliberalism have argued that it represents a lapse into a “ghetto ethic” or some form of “fideism” or “tribalism,” on account of its retreat from universal norms of value and rationality.

Postliberals respond to their liberal critics by arguing that the latter seem unable to accept that the Enlightenment is over, and that any notion of a “universal language” or “common human experience” is simply a fiction, like – to use Hans-Georg Gadamer's famous analogy – Robinson Crusoe's imaginary island.

Postliberalism has proved particularly influential in two areas of Christian theology. Although it has achieved some influence in systematic theology, it is generally agreed that its influence has been greatest in the field of Christian ethics.

Systematic Theology

Paul Holmer's Grammar of Faith (1978) developed the ideas that Christianity possesses a central grammar which regulates the structure and shape of Christian “language games.” This language is not invented or imposed by theology; it is already inherent within the biblical paradigms upon which theology is ultimately dependent. The task of theology is thus to discern these intra-biblical rules (such as the manner in which God is worshiped and spoken about), not to impose extra-biblical rules.

This idea is developed further in George Lindbeck's Nature of Doctrine (1980), which argues that theology is to be understood primarily as a descriptive discipline, concerned with the exploration of the normative foundations of the Christian tradition, which are mediated through the scriptural narrative of Jesus Christ. Truth can be, at least in part, equated with fidelity to the distinctive doctrinal traditions of the Christian faith. This has caused critics of postliberalism to accuse it of retreating from the public arena into some kind of Christian ghetto. If Christian theology, as postliberalism suggests, is intrasystemic (that is, concerned with the exploration of the internal relationships of the Christian tradition), its validity is to be judged with reference to its own internal standards, rather than some publicly agreed or universal criteria. Once more, this has prompted criticism from those who suggest that theology ought to have external criteria, subject to public scrutiny, by which its validity can be tested.

Christian Ethics

Stanley Hauerwas (born 1940) is widely regarded as the most distinguished writer to explore postliberal approaches to ethics. Rejecting the Enlightenment idea of a universal set of moral ideals or values, Hauerwas argues that Christian ethics is concerned with the identification of the moral vision of an historical community (the church), and with bringing that vision to actualization in the lives of its members. Thus, ethics is intrasystemic, in that it concerns the study of the internal moral values of a community. To be moral is to identify the moral vision of a specific historical community, to appropriate its moral values, and to practice them within that community.

Radical Orthodoxy

Finally, we may turn to consider a movement that has recently arisen within English-language theology, and which has generated some important discussion and debate. The term “radical orthodoxy” is used to refer to a broad approach to theology which emerged in the 1990s, associated with writers such as John Milbank (born 1952), Catherine Pickstock (born 1952), and Graham Ward (born 1955), all of whom were originally based at Cambridge University. Its ideas are set out in works such as John Milbank's Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (1993) and especially the edited volume Radical Orthodoxy: A New Theology (1999).

In what sense is this movement “radical”? Where some use the term “radical” to mean “liberal” or “revisionist,” this school emphasizes the movement's attempt to return to the roots of Christian orthodoxy, aiming to revive rather than revise traditional doctrines. The agenda of the movement is complex and sophisticated, and is perhaps best understood in terms of the need for Christianity to construct its own alternatives to both modernity and postmodernity, based on a coherent vision of Christian theology. Milbank, Pickstock, and Ward hope to articulate a comprehensive Christian perspective that will both supersede and replace secularisms, whether modern or postmodern, finding in writers such as Augustine of Hippo models worthy of emulation. While it is still too early to determine how successful the movement will be in the longer term, it is clear that it will be the subject of continued discussion in the near future.

It will be clear from this brief survey of the past few centuries that Christianity has both expanded and undergone considerable development during this period. We must now turn to consider its major themes in greater detail, beginning by considering, in the next part, issues of sources and methods.

GETTING STARTED

PRELIMINARIES

Before engaging with the ideas of Christian theology, we need to explore the way in which those ideas are developed. What are the sources of theology? How does theology develop its basic ideas and themes? This second part of this book will consider these and many other related matters, before we move on to deal with the substance of Christian theology in the third part of this work. This part touches on many of the themes that are often described as “fundamental theology,” such as the nature of revelation.

This opening chapter of the second major section of this work surveys some general themes which underlie the discipline of Christian theology. We begin by considering what is meant by “faith.”

What is Faith?

Earlier, we noted the opening statement of the main Christian creeds: “I believe in God.” So what does it mean to talk about “believing in God”? What are we to understand by words such as “belief” and “faith”?

To begin with, we need to note a distinction between two senses of the word “faith.” Christian theologians have traditionally distinguished faith understood as a set of beliefs, and faith understood as an act of believing. Two Latin phrases are often used in the theological literature to express this difference between the content of faith and an act of faith.

1. Fides quae creditur (Latin: “the faith which is believed”). This refers to an objective set of beliefs, such as those set out in the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene Creed. These are understood to provide an outline of the basic beliefs of the Christian faith.

2. Fides qua creditur (Latin: “the faith by which it is believed”). This refers to a subjective act of trust or assent, by which individual believers accept the basic ideas of the Christian faith.

The relationship between these objective and subjective aspects of faith is regularly discussed in works of theology. There is a general consensus, transcending denominational divisions, that both elements need to be part of a proper understanding of faith. Faith affects the human mind, heart, and will. This is reflected in a comment on faith made by the Anglican writer W. H. Griffith-Thomas (1861–1924):

[Faith] commences with the conviction of the mind based on adequate evidence; it continues in the confidence of the heart or emotions based on conviction; and it is crowned in the consent of the will, by means of which the conviction and confidence are expressed in conduct.

The biblical sense of the word “faith” includes the idea of trusting in God, which stands at the center of the Old Testament account of the calling of Abraham (Genesis 15: 1–6). This tells of how God promised to give Abraham countless descendants, as numerous as the stars of the night sky. Abraham believed God – that is, trusted the promise that was made to him. Abraham did not merely accept that a God existed; he trusted this God. John Macquarrie (1919–2007) makes a similar point when he notes that “faith is not a mere belief but an existential attitude” which includes “acceptance and commitment.”

This process of the intellectual exploration of the consequences of trust in God or in Jesus of Nazareth is often framed using a slogan introduced by Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109) in the eleventh century. Anselm used the Latin phrase fides quaerens intellectum (Latin: “faith seeking understanding”) to refer to the process by which someone who comes to trust God begins to explore the intellectual landscape that this implies. Anselm did not mean to replace faith with understanding but to supplement faith with understanding, seeing this as a natural progression from trusting God to understanding God.

So is faith simply an act of human trust? Or is God somehow involved in this process? This question was of particular importance during the Pelagian controversy (see pp. 330–4), which explored the interplay of the human and divine in faith and salvation. The Catechism of the Catholic Church expressed this point well:

Believing is possible only by grace and the interior help of the Holy Spirit. But it is no less true that believing is an authentically human act. Trusting in God and cleaving to the truths he has revealed is contrary neither to human freedom nor to human reason.

John Calvin (1509–64) expressed this idea in his Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), emphasizing both the importance of faith as a trusting response to God's promises and the role of the Holy Spirit in enabling this human response.

Now we shall have a right definition of faith if we say that it is a steady and certain knowledge of the divine benevolence towards us, which is founded upon the truth of the gracious promise of God in Christ, and is both revealed to our minds and sealed in our hearts by the Holy Spirit.

So how does faith relate to reason? We shall discuss this question in Chapter 6, when we look at reason as a source of theology, and more fully in Chapter 8, which considers the relationship between philosophy and theology. Yet some initial reflections will be helpful at this stage.

One of the most important recent discussions of the relationship between faith and reason is found in the 1998 encyclical letter Fides et Ratio (“Faith and Reason”), by Pope John Paul II (1920–2005). The letter opens with a declaration that faith and reason can work together. Human beings long to know the truth, and are constantly searching for it. “In the far reaches of the human heart there is a seed of desire and nostalgia for God.”

So can reason alone lead humanity to this truth? The letter pays a handsome tribute to philosophy, as the legitimate human quest for truth. Philosophy is “one of the noblest of human tasks,” which is “driven by the desire to discover the ultimate truth of existence.” Yet unaided human reason cannot fully penetrate to the mystery of life. It cannot answer questions such as “why are we here?” For this reason, God graciously chose to make these things known through revelation, which would otherwise remain unknown. “The truth made known to us by Revelation is neither the product nor the consummation of an argument devised by human reason.”

The letter stresses that faith is not blind trust, opposed to the evidence of the world. Rather, it points out that the world – which Christians see as God's creation – is studded with hints of God's existence and nature. It appeals to Paul's sermon preached at the Areopagus in Athens (Acts 17) in arguing that it is entirely reasonable to infer the existence of God from the wonders of nature and a human sense of divinity within us. These do not count as “proofs”; they can, however, be interpreted as confirmation or corroboration of the basic themes of faith. Having believed, we long to understand the inner dynamics and structures of our faith – the basic idea which is expressed in Anselm's slogan fides quaerens intellectum.

Defining Theology

Theology is basically the systematic study of the fundamental ideas of the Christian faith. The word “theology” is often used in a rather functional sense, meaning something like “a course of specialized religious study, usually undertaken at a college or seminary.” This, however, does not really do justice to the nature of theology as a distinct intellectual discipline in its own right, or as a discipline that serves the ministry of Christian churches. In what follows, we shall try to give a more satisfying account of the nature of Christian theology, and identify some of its hallmarks.

A Working Definition of Theology

The term “theology” is generally used to mean something like “the systematic study of the ideas of a religion,” including their sources, historical development, mutual relationship, and application to life. The phrase “Christian theology” is more specifically understood to mean the systematic study of the ideas of the Christian faith, including the following four issues:

1. The sources of theology. A central theological task concerns the sources on which Christian ideas are based, and how they relate to each other. For most Christian theologians, these sources include the Christian Bible, tradition, reason, and experience. Some of the most important debates within Christian theology have concerned the priority that ought to be given to each of these elements. We shall discuss the sources of theology thoroughly in Chapter 6.
2. The development of theology. This concerns the ways in which these ideas have emerged over time. Christian theology is often likened to a growing plant. At times, it grows; at others, it needs pruning. This aspect of Christian theology is often referred to as “historical theology.” The approach adopted in this textbook means that each theme of Christian theology – for example, the nature of the church – is considered both in terms of its historical development and its contemporary statements.
3. The coherence of theology. This considers the way in which Christian ideas relate to each other, building up to give an overall picture of reality. The English theologian Charles Gore (1853–1932) once spoke of the “wonderful coherence of Christian dogma,” which seemed to him to be like an interconnected network of ideas – an intellectual spider's web, with each element related to and supporting others, rather than as a set of isolated watertight compartments. To mention two examples that we shall consider later in this volume: there is a very close relationship between the Christian doctrines of incarnation and the Trinity, and between the doctrines of the person of Christ and the work of Christ.

4. The applications of theology. This has to do with the difference that the ideas of Christian theology make to the way in which Christians relate to each other, pray, worship, and exist within the world. Christian theology is not just a set of ideas; it is about making possible a new way of seeing ourselves, others, and the world, with implications for the way in which we behave. This aspect of Christian theology is summed up in some famous words of the English lay theologian C. S. Lewis (1898–1963): “I believe in Christianity as I believe that the Sun has risen, not only because I see it, but because by it, I see everything else.”

The Historical Development of the Idea of Theology

The word “theology” is derived from two Greek words: theos (“God”) and logos (“word” or “discourse”). “Theology” is thus discourse about God, in much the same way as “biology” is discourse about life (Greek: bios). If there is only one God, and if that God happens to be the “God of the Christians” (to borrow a phrase from the third-century writer Tertullian, c.160–c.220), the nature and scope of theology are relatively well defined: theology is reflection upon the God whom Christians worship and adore.

The word “theology” is not biblical, but came to be used occasionally in the early patristic period to refer to at least some aspects of Christian beliefs. Thus, Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215), writing in the late second century, contrasted Christian theologia with the mythologia of pagan writers, clearly understanding “theology” to refer to “Christian truth claims about God,” which could be compared with the spurious stories of pagan mythology. Other writers of the patristic period, such as Eusebius of Caesarea (c.263–339), also use the term to refer to something like “the Christian understanding of God.” However, it seems that the word was not used to refer to the entire body of Christian thought, but only to those aspects relating directly to God.

Yet Christianity came into existence in a polytheistic world, where belief in the existence of many gods was commonplace. Classical Roman culture, for example, recognized a large number of gods, which were honored by ceremonies of state and in family devotion. Part of the task of the earliest Christian writers was to distinguish the Christian god from other gods in the religious marketplace. Christian theology thus had both a positive and a critical function. On the one hand, it explained what kind of god lay at the heart of the Christian faith, developing New Testament ideas such as “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Peter 1: 3). On the other, it showed how this god was not to be confused with those of Roman civil religion, such as Jupiter or Mars.

One particularly important question concerned the relation of the God of the New Testament to that of the Old Testament. How did the “God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” relate to the “God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” who figures so prominently in the Old Testament? The doctrine of the Trinity appears to have been, in part, a response to the pressure to identify the god that Christian theologians were speaking about (see p. 301).

As time passed, polytheism began to be regarded as outdated and rather primitive. The assumption that there is only one god, and that this god is identical to the Christian god, became so widespread in western culture that, by the early Middle Ages in Europe, it seemed self-evidently true. Thus Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), in developing arguments for the existence of God in the thirteenth century, did not think it worth demonstrating that the god whose existence he had proved was the “god of the Christians”: after all, what other god was there? To prove the existence of God was, by definition, to prove the existence of the Christian god.

Although “theology” was initially understood to mean “the doctrine of God,” the term developed a subtly new meaning in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, as the great medieval universities – such as the Universities of Paris and Oxford – began to emerge. A name had to be found for the systematic study of the Christian faith at university level. The influence of Parisian writers such as Gilbert of Poitiers (1070–1154) and Peter Abelard (1079–1142) led to the Latin word theologia coming to mean “the discipline of sacred learning,” embracing the totality of Christian doctrine and not merely the doctrine of God.

More recently, attention has shifted toward the study of the human phenomenon of religion. “Religious studies” or “the study of religions” is concerned with investigating religious matters – for example, the beliefs or religious practices of Christianity and Buddhism – without any fixed view on their truth. In practice, the term “theology” is now often used to refer to the study of religion from a committed perspective, where “religious studies” denotes a critical or neutral perspective. Yet this usage is not consistent.

The phrase “Christian theology” is used throughout this volume in the sense of the systematic study of the fundamental ideas of the Christian faith. This basic approach can be seen in a number of definitions of theology offered by its leading practitioners, such as Karl Rahner (1904–84, Catholic), John Macquarrie (1919–2007, Anglican), and Karl Barth (1886–1968, Reformed). Each of these descriptions of the nature and tasks of theology is helpful in getting a sense of its identity and focus. You might like to spend a few moments reflecting on these three definitions. Note that both Rahner and Barth are using the word “science” in the sense of “an intellectual discipline.”

- “Theology is the science of faith. It is the conscious and methodical explanation and explication of the divine revelation received and grasped in faith” (Karl Rahner).
- “Theology may be defined as the study which, through participation in and reflection upon a religious faith, seeks to express the content of this faith in the clearest and most coherent language available” (John Macquarrie).
- “Theology is science seeking the knowledge of the Word of God spoken in God's work – science learning in the school of the Holy Scripture, which witnesses to the Word of God; science laboring in the quest for truth, which is inescapably required of the community that is called by the Word of God” (Karl Barth).

The Development of Theology as an Academic Discipline

This introduction to Christian theology affirms that it is one of the most worthwhile and exciting academic subjects it is possible to study. But how did this subject emerge? How did theology come to find its way onto the academic curriculum?

In the period of the early church, theology was primarily an activity undertaken within the church. A firm understanding of the intellectual substance of the faith was seen as essential to Christian teaching, preaching, and apologetics. An excellent example of this can be found in Cyril of Jerusalem's (c.313–86) Catechetical Lectures, delivered in Jerusalem around the year 350. These lectures set out a basic understanding of the leading themes of faith, exploring their implications for both life and thought, and distinguishing Christianity from Judaism and paganism. Yet there was no real equivalent of a “theological academy,” paralleling the philosophical academies developed by Plato and Aristotle in the classical period.

Perhaps the most important moment in the history of theology as an academic discipline was the founding of universities in western Europe during the twelfth century. The great medieval universities – such as Paris and Oxford – generally had four faculties: arts, medicine, law, and theology. The faculty of arts was seen as entry level, qualifying students to go on to more advanced studies in the three “higher faculties.” The result of this development was that theology became established as a significant component of advanced study at European universities. As more and more universities were established in western Europe, so the academic study of theology became more widespread.

Initially, the study of Christianity in western Europe was focused on schools attached to cathedrals and monasteries (p. 24). Theology was generally understood to be concerned with practical matters, such as issues of prayer and spirituality, rather than as a theoretical subject. However, with the founding of the universities, the academic study of the Christian faith gradually moved out of monasteries and cathedrals into the public arena. The word “theology” came to be used extensively at the University of Paris during the thirteenth century to refer to the systematic discussion of Christian beliefs in general, and not simply beliefs about God. The use of the word in this sense can be seen to a limited extent in earlier works, such as the writings of Peter Abelard. However, the work which is widely regarded as being of decisive importance in establishing the general use of the term appeared in the thirteenth century – Thomas Aquinas's Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”). Increasingly, theology came to be seen as a theoretical rather than a practical subject, despite reservations about this development.

Many early thirteenth-century theologians, such as Alexander of Hales (c.1185–1245) and Bonaventure (1221–74), were concerned about the implications of neglecting the practical side of theology. However, Thomas Aquinas's argument that theology was a speculative and theoretical discipline gained increasing favor among theologians. This alarmed many medieval spiritual writers, such as Thomas à Kempis (c.1379–1471), who felt that this encouraged speculation about God rather than obedience to God.

At the time of the Reformation, Protestant writers such as Martin Luther (1483–1546) attempted to rediscover the practical aspects of theology. The Genevan Academy, founded by John Calvin in 1559, was initially concerned with the theological education of pastors and was oriented toward the practical needs of ministry in the church. This tradition of treating theology as concerned with the practical matters of Christian ministry would continue in many Protestant seminaries and colleges. However, later Protestant writers operating in a university context generally returned to the medieval understanding of theology as a theoretical subject, even if they made it clear that it had certain definite practical implications in the areas of spirituality and ethics.

The rise of the Enlightenment during the eighteenth century, particularly in Germany, called the place of theology in the university into question. Enlightenment writers argued that academic inquiry should be free from any kind of external authority or intellectual precommitment. Theology was regarded with suspicion; it was seen to be based on “articles of faith,” such as those contained in the Christian creeds or in the Bible, rather than on rational analysis. Theology came increasingly to be seen as outmoded. The philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) argued that university faculties of philosophy were concerned with the pursuit of truth, while other faculties (such as theology, medicine, and law) were concerned with more practical matters, such as ethics and good health. Increasingly, philosophy came to be seen as the discipline that was concerned with issues of truth; the continuing existence of a university faculty of theology would have to be justified on other grounds.

One of the most robust justifications of the need for university faculties of theology was provided in the early nineteenth century by F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834), who argued that it was essential for the good of both the church and state to have a well-educated clergy. In his Brief Outline of the Study of Theology (1811), Schleiermacher argued that theology had three major components: philosophical theology (which identifies the “essence of Christianity”); historical theology (which deals with the history of the church, in order to understand its present situation and needs); and practical theology (which is concerned with “techniques” of church leadership and practice). This approach to theology had the result of linking its academic credentials with public agreement that it was important for society to have a well-educated clergy. This assumption was perfectly acceptable in early nineteenth-century Berlin, where Schleiermacher was based. But, with the rise of secularism and pluralism in the west, its validity has come increasingly to be questioned.

In countries in which a strongly secular approach came to be adopted, Christian theology was virtually excluded from the university curriculum. The French Revolution of 1789 led to a series of measures designed to eliminate Christian theology from public education at every level. Most of the older universities in Australia (such as the universities of Sydney and Melbourne) were founded on the basis of strongly secular assumptions, with theology being excluded as a matter of principle. These strongly secular ideologies are now being relaxed, so that undergraduate degrees in theology, or with significant theological components, are now available in Australia.

However, it is a pluralist rather than a secular approach that is now more widespread in the west, particularly in North America. Here, the distinctive position of Christian theology in public education has been called into question as this is held to privilege one religion over others. One result of this trend has been the formation of “faculties of religion” in state universities, in which a variety of religious positions are tolerated. Christian theology can therefore be taught in such a context, but only as one aspect of religious studies as a whole. For this reason, the most important centers of Christian theological education and research now tend to be in seminaries, in which a more committed approach to the issues can be adopted.

We may now turn to explore the architecture of theology, as we consider its various components.

The Architecture of Theology

Etienne Gilson (1884–1978) once likened the great systems of scholastic theology to “cathedrals of the mind.” It is a powerful image, one that suggests permanence, solidity, organization, and structure – qualities which were highly prized by the writers of the medieval period. It is clear from reading older works of theology, whether from the patristic period or the Middle Ages, that the term “theology” once embraced a wide variety of disciplines that are now regarded as separate or distinct. Something of this vision of theology can be grasped through reading Jean Leclercq's (1911–93) book The Love of Learning and the Desire for God (1981). Leclercq explores how medieval monastic culture fostered a love of learning in which theology was seen as holding together contemplation of the scriptures, the search for wisdom, liturgy and prayer, human work and labor, and pastoral concerns.

Modern distinctions between apologetics, spirituality, pastoral care, and systematic theology were not known to pre-Enlightenment thinkers, who saw these as distinct yet interconnected aspects of theology as a whole. The Egyptian monastic writer Evagrius Ponticus (c.345–99), for example, saw theology in terms of prayer: “If you are a theologian, you will pray truly. And if you pray truly, you are a theologian.”

The idea of theology possessing a distinctive and coherent structure remains important. Yet theology has now become a complex discipline, bringing together a number of related fields, sometimes in an uneasy alliance. In what follows, we shall note the main divisions of modern theology.

Biblical Studies

Many theologians see the ultimate source of Christian theology as the Bible, which bears witness to the historical grounding of Christianity in both the history of Israel and the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The rise of Renaissance biblical scholarship in the early 1500s demonstrated a series of translation errors in existing Latin versions of the Bible (see pp. 36–7). As a result, pressure grew for the revision of some existing Christian doctrines, which were grounded in biblical passages that were once held to support them but which now turned out to say something rather different. The sixteenth-century Reformation may plausibly be argued to represent an attempt to bring theology back into line with Scripture, after a period in which it had departed considerably from it.

Systematic theology is thus dependent upon biblical scholarship, although the extent of that dependence is controversial. The reader must therefore expect to find reference to modern scholarly debates over the historical and theological role of the Bible in the present volume. It is impossible to understand the development of modern approaches to Christology without coming to terms with at least some of the developments in biblical scholarship over the past two centuries. For example, the approach to theology developed by Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) can be argued to bring together contemporary New Testament scholarship, systematic theology, and philosophical theology (specifically, existentialism). This illustrates a vitally important point: systematic theology does not operate in a watertight compartment, isolated from other intellectual developments. It responds to developments in other disciplines (especially New Testament scholarship and philosophy).

Systematic Theology

The term “systematic theology” has come to be understood as “the systematic organization of theology.” But what does “systematic” mean? Two main understandings of the term have emerged. First, the term is understood to mean “organized on the basis of educational or presentational concerns.” In other words, the prime concern is to present a clear and ordered overview of the main themes of the Christian faith, often following the pattern of the Apostles' Creed. In the second place, it can mean “organized on the basis of presuppositions about method.” In other words, philosophical ideas about how knowledge is gained determine the way in which material is arranged. This approach is of particular importance in the modern period, when a concern about theological method has become more pronounced.

In the classic period of theology, the subject matter of theology was generally organized along lines suggested by the Apostles' Creed or Nicene Creed, beginning with the doctrine of God and ending with eschatology. Classic models for the systematization of theology are provided by a number of writings. The first major theological textbook of western theology was the Four Books of the Sentences, compiled at the University of Paris during the twelfth century by Peter Lombard (c.1100–60), probably during the years 1155–8. In essence, the work is a collection of quotations (or “sentences”), drawn from patristic writers in general, and Augustine (354–430) in particular. These quotations are arranged topically. The first of the four books deals with the Trinity, the second with creation and sin, the third with incarnation and Christian life, and the fourth and final book with the sacraments and the last things. Commenting on these sentences became a standard practice for medieval theologians, such as Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus (1266–1308). Thomas Aquinas's Summa theologiae, dating from a century later, surveyed the totality of Christian theology in three parts, using principles similar to those adopted by Peter Lombard while placing greater emphasis on philosophical questions (particularly those raised by Aristotle) and the need to reconcile the different opinions of patristic writers.

Two different Protestant models emerged at the time of the Reformation. On the Lutheran side, Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560) produced his Commonplaces in 1521. This work provided a survey of the main aspects of Christian theology, arranged topically. John Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion is widely regarded as the most influential work of Protestant theology. The first edition of this work appeared in 1536, and its definitive final edition in 1559. The 1559 edition is divided into four books, the first of which deals with the doctrine of God, the second with Christ as mediator between God and humanity, the third with the appropriation of redemption, and the final book with the life of the church. Other, more recent, major works of systematic theology to follow similar lines include Karl Barth's massive Church Dogmatics (1936–69).

In the modern period, issues of method have become of greater importance, with the result that the issue of “prolegomena” (see p. 94) has become significant. An example of a modern work of systematic theology which is heavily influenced by such concerns is F. D. E. Schleiermacher's Christian Faith, the first edition of which appeared in 1821–2. The organization of material within this work is governed by the presupposition that theology concerns the analysis of human experience. Thus, Schleiermacher famously places the doctrine of the Trinity at the end of his systematic theology, whereas Aquinas placed it toward the beginning.

Philosophical Theology

Theology is an intellectual discipline in its own right, concerned with many of the questions that have intrigued humanity since the dawn of history. Is there a god? What is that god like? Why are we here? Questions such as this are asked outside the Christian community as well as within it. So how do these conversations relate to one another? How do Christian discussions of the nature of God relate to those within the western philosophical tradition? Is there common ground? Philosophical theology is partly concerned with what might be called “finding the common ground” between Christian faith and other areas of intellectual activity. Thomas Aquinas's “Five Ways” (that is, five arguments for the existence of God) are often cited as an example of philosophical theology, in which nonreligious arguments or considerations are seen to lead to religious conclusions.

Philosophical theology also serves another major role – that of the clarification of ideas. Many of the great debates in theology concern issues that are philosophically important and which can be illuminated by rigorous philosophical reflection. Examples of this include God's relationship to time, concepts such as divine immutability and omnipotence, and general issues concerning the foundations and reliability of knowledge. An excellent example, discussed later in this work, is how philosophical reflection on the idea of a “person” – particularly in the writings of the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber (1878–1965) – has been of major importance in clarifying and exploring what Christians mean when speaking of a “personal God.” Indeed, the general area of philosophical theology is often regarded as one of the most exciting fields of modern theology, with writers such as Alvin Plantinga (born 1932), Nicholas Wolterstorff (born 1932), and Richard Swinburne (born 1934) making landmark contributions to a number of areas of theology.

Some theologians have expressed reservations about the place of philosophical theology. Thus, in the second century Tertullian raised the question: “What has Athens to do with Jerusalem? Or the Academy with the church?” More recently, the same critical reaction may be seen in the writings of Karl Barth (see pp. 72–4), who argued that the use of philosophy in this way ultimately made God's self-revelation dependent upon a particular philosophy, and compromised the freedom of God. However, the consensus within Christian theology as a whole is that this process of dialogue and reflection is both helpful and productive, and is integral to the theological task.

Historical Theology

Theology has a history. This insight is too easily overlooked, especially by those of a more philosophical inclination. Christian theology can be regarded as an attempt to make sense of the foundational resources of faith in the light of what each day and age regards as first-rate methods. This means that local circumstances have a major impact upon theological formulations. Christian theology regards itself as universal because it is concerned with the application of God's saving action to every period in history. Yet it is also characterized by its particularity as an experience of God's saving work in particular cultures, and is shaped by the insights and limitations of persons who were themselves seeking to live the gospel within a particular context. The universality of Christianity is thus complemented, rather than contradicted, by its particular application. This point is made with particular clarity by the Swiss Protestant theologian Emil Brunner (1889–1966): “There is indeed an evangelium perennis but not a theologia perennis [...] The gospel remains the same, but our understanding of the gospel must ever be won anew.”

Historical theology is the branch of theology that aims to explore the historical situations within which ideas developed or were specifically formulated. It aims to lay bare the connection between context and theology. For example, it demonstrates that it was no accident that the doctrine of justification by faith first became of foundational significance in the late Renaissance. It shows how, for example, the concept of salvation found in Latin American liberation theology is closely linked with the socioeconomic situation of the region. It illustrates how secular cultural trends – such as liberalism and conservatism – find their corresponding expression in theology.

It may seem to be little more than stating a self-evident fact to say that Christianity often unconsciously absorbs ideas and values from its cultural backdrop. Yet that observation is enormously important. It points to the fact that there is a provisional or conditional element to Christian theology, which is not necessitated by or implied in its foundational resources. In other words, certain ideas which have often been regarded as Christian ideas may turn out to be ideas imported from a secular context. A classic example is the notion of the “impassibility of God” – that is, the idea that God cannot suffer (see pp. 181–6). This idea was well established in Greek philosophical circles. Early Christian theologians, anxious to gain respect and credibility in such circles, did not challenge this idea. As a result, it became deeply embedded in the Christian theological tradition.

The study of the history of Christianity provides a powerful corrective to static views of theology. It allows us to see that:

1. Certain ideas came into being under very definite circumstances, and that these ideas require to be tested and validated over time – a process often referred to as “reception.”
2. Theological development is not irreversible; theological formulations of the past which are seen to be inadequate or unhelpful may be corrected.

The study of historical theology is thus both positive and subversive, as it indicates how easily theologians are led astray by the “self-images of the age” (Alasdair MacIntyre). Nor is this something that is restricted to the past! Too often, modern trends in theology are little more than knee-jerk reactions to short-term cultural trends. The study of history makes us alert both to the mistakes of the past and to the alarming way in which they are repeated in the present. “History repeats itself. It has to. Nobody listens the first time round” (Woody Allen).

It is for such reasons that the present volume aims to provide its readers with the maximum amount of historical background to contemporary issues. All too often, theological issues are conducted as if the debate began yesterday. An understanding of how we got to be where we are is essential to an informed debate of such issues.

Furthermore, past discussions of issues are often important resources in the present. It is impossible to read writers such as Karl Barth or Karl Rahner without noticing how often they enter into dialogue with past writers or debates. Augustine of Hippo, Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394), and Thomas Aquinas are treated as living voices in today's debates. They represent landmarks, which continue to define the terms of many perennial theological debates.

Practical, or Pastoral, Theology

There is a strongly pastoral and practical dimension to Christianity that is generally inadequately reflected in the academic discussion of theology. Indeed, many scholars have argued that Latin American liberation theology represents an overdue correction of the excessively academic bias of western theology, with a healthy adjustment in the direction of social applicability. Theology is here seen as offering models for transformative action, rather than purely theoretical reflection.

This academic bias is, however, a recent development. The linking of theological reflection and pastoral care is characteristic of many early Christian writers, and is especially evident in the Book of Pastoral Rules (590), by Gregory the Great (c.540–604). Puritanism is an excellent instance of a movement that placed theological integrity alongside pastoral applicability, believing that each was incomplete without the other. Richard Baxter (1615–91) and Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) both held that theology finds its true expression in pastoral care and the nurture of souls.

In more recent years, this concern to ensure that theology finds its expression in pastoral care has led to a resurgence of interest in pastoral theology. Schleiermacher added “practical theology” to the traditional university theological curriculum, supplementing biblical studies, systematic theology, and church history. Schleiermacher understood “practical theology” as a discipline that would develop “rules of art” for Christian life and ministry.

Pastoral (or practical) theology – the terminology remains fluid – gained new strength in the west in the period following the Second World War. The Swiss theologian Eduard Thurneysen (1888–1974), an early associate of Karl Barth, produced his classic work A Theology of Pastoral Care in 1946. This focused on the role of preaching as a means of mediating God's Word to humans to bring about healing and hope. However, leadership in this field quickly passed to the United States, with American thinkers such as Edward Farley (1929–2014) and Don S. Browning (1934–2010) playing a leading role in exploring how the Christian tradition informed and enriched the pastoral tasks of the church.

Rather than seeing theology as an academic subject that has no relevance to the practical techniques of counseling and therapy, pastoral theology emphasizes how a theological foundation provides both a framework and a resource for pastoral care. It “tries to answer the question of what we should do in the face of problems and challenges to faithful action” (Browning). Practical theology is thus about the interface of thought and action. Stephen Pattison and James Woodward offer this helpful description of the discipline:

Practical theology is a place where religious belief, tradition, and practice meets contemporary experiences, questions, and actions and conducts a dialogue that is mutually enriching, intellectually critical, and practically transforming.

At its heart, practical theology is thus critical reflection upon the actions of the church in the light of the gospel and the Christian tradition. Theology provides a way of evaluating situations, and offers resources to deal with them.

Spirituality, or Mystical Theology

The term “spirituality” has gained wide acceptance in the recent past as the preferred way of referring to aspects of the devotional practices of a religion, and especially the interior individual experiences of believers. Older terms which are still encountered in the scholarly literature to refer to this aspect of theology include “spiritual theology” and “mystical theology.” The use of the word “mystical” to refer to the spiritual (as opposed to the purely academic) dimension of theology can be traced back to the treatise On Mystical Theology, written in the early sixth century by Dionysius the Areopagite.

The modern terms “spirituality” and “mysticism” both trace their origins back to seventeenth-century France, and specifically to the rather elitist circles of salon society associated with Madame de Guyon (1648–1717). The French terms spiritualité and mysticisme were both used to refer to direct interior knowledge of the divine or supernatural, and were apparently treated as more or less synonymous at the time. Since then, both terms have been brought back into circulation, although changes in their associations have led to some degree of confusion over their precise meaning, with some writers suggesting that the two are just different ways of speaking about an authentic personal relationship with God, while others suggest that mysticism is to be seen as a special type of spirituality which places particular emphasis on a direct and unmediated personal experience of God. Many recent writers have avoided the use of the term “mysticism,” believing that it has become unhelpful and confusing. The term “spirituality” has thus come to be used in preference to many terms which are encountered in older writings, including “mystical theology,” “spiritual theology,” and “mysticism.”

Spirituality is often contrasted with a purely academic, objective, or detached approach to a religion, which is seen as merely identifying and listing the key beliefs and practices of a religion rather than dealing with the manner in which individual adherents of the religion experience and practice their faith. The term is resistant to precise definition, partly due to the variety of senses in which it is used and partly due to controversy within the community of scholars specializing in the field over the manner in which the term ought to be used. However, it is clear that spirituality is generally understood to mean the experiencing of God and the transformation of lives as outcomes of that experience. Spirituality thus refers to a lived experience of God, and the life of prayer and action that results from this; however, at the same time, it cannot be conceived apart from the theological beliefs which undergird that life.

While there is agreement that spirituality is an important aspect of Christian theology, and that growing attention is being paid to teaching and research in this field within Christian seminaries, the question of exactly how theology and spirituality interact has been the subject of intense discussion in recent decades. While this debate lies beyond this introduction, it may easily be studied from any good introduction to the field of Christian spirituality.

Apologetics

Apologetics, derived from the Greek term apologia (“defense” or “justification”), has always been an integral aspect of Christian theology. It is best understood as the engagement of contemporary cultural concerns about the rationality and morality of Christian belief. The discipline has a long history, tending to emerge as significant when Christianity encountered intellectual hostility. For example, Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165), one of the early church's most important apologists, wrote in the context of intense antagonism and suspicion toward Christianity in second-century Rome. Justin offered a defense of the intellectual integrity of Christianity against its pagan and Jewish critics, identifying and responding to their main criticisms. During the Middle Ages, Thomas Aquinas crafted his Summa contra Gentiles (“Summary against the Gentiles”) as a rational defense of Christianity, aimed at Islamic and Jewish critics.

Apologetics remained important within western culture as the churches faced new challenges, particularly as a result of the rise of Enlightenment rationalism. Joseph Butler's (1692–1752) Analogy of Religion (1736) argued that Christianity could defend itself in the face of this new intellectual climate. The discipline became of particular importance in the twentieth century. One of its leading representatives was the lay theologian C. S. Lewis, who gained a reputation for being able to explain and justify the basic ideas of the Christian faith in an engaging and stimulating way to a lay audience. His first work to adopt this approach was The Problem of Pain (1940), which offered a way of looking at pain and suffering that Lewis believed minimized the difficulties they posed for faith. His most successful work was Mere Christianity (1952), which is often identified in popular surveys as the most influential religious book of the twentieth century.

The Question of Prolegomena

Anyone beginning the study of an unfamiliar subject faces the same problem: where should you begin? There seem to be so many ways of approaching subjects such as philosophy, the natural sciences, and theology that some kind of confusion over this question is inevitable. In theology, the debate over where theology should start has become known as the “question of prolegomena.” The Greek term prolegomena could be translated as “forewords” – in other words, things that need to be said before beginning the study of theology itself.

The question of what starting point should be adopted is of importance not merely to theology but also to a number of related subjects. An obvious example is apologetics, the discipline which aims to make Christianity credible to those outside the faith. For example, the second-century apologists (writers such as Justin Martyr, whose concern was to gain a serious hearing for Christianity among its educated opponents) took considerable trouble to find experiences and beliefs which Christians shared with their pagan counterparts. By beginning from this point, they believed that they could show how Christianity built upon and complemented these shared experiences and ideas.

Since the time of the Enlightenment, the question of prolegomena has become of especial importance. Before theology can explore the content of the Christian faith, it has to be shown how anyone can know anything about God in the first place. Talking about how we can know anything about God comes to be at least as important as discussing what we know about God. Increasing secularization in Europe and North America meant that theologians could no longer assume that their audiences would have any sympathy with the Christian faith. Accordingly, many theologians regarded it as vitally important to find some common starting point which would allow those outside the faith to have access to its insights.

Among these approaches, which seek to anchor Christian theology in the basic experiences of human existence, the following are especially important.

1. F. D. E. Schleiermacher argued that a common feature of human experience was “the feeling of absolute dependence.” Christian theology expressed and interpreted this basic human emotion as “a feeling of dependence upon God,” and related it to the Christian doctrines of sin and redemption.
2. Paul Tillich (1886–1965) developed a “method of correlation” (see p. 68), based on his belief that human beings ask certain “ultimate questions” about their existence. “In using the method of correlation, systematic theology proceeds in the following way: It makes an analysis of the human situation out of which the existential questions arise, and it demonstrates that the symbols used in the Christian message are the answers to these questions.”
3. Karl Rahner drew attention to the importance of the basic human urge to transcend the limitations of human nature. Human beings are aware of a sense of being made for more than they now are, or more than they can ever hope to achieve by their own abilities.

The Christian revelation supplies this “more,” to which human experience points.

Nevertheless, such approaches (especially as developed by Schleiermacher and his immediate followers) have provoked hostile reactions. The most significant of these is to be found in the neo-orthodox school (see pp. 72–4), represented by Karl Barth, which protested against what it believed to be a reduction of theology to human needs, or an imprisonment of theology within the confines of some philosophy of human existence.

Barth declared that Christian theology was not in any sense dependent upon human philosophy but was autonomous and self-supporting. God was perfectly capable of revealing himself without any human assistance. The word “prolegomena” was not to be understood as “things which need to be said before theology is possible.” Rather, it was to be understood as “the things that must be said first in theology” – in other words, the doctrine of the Word of God.

Questions of method have dominated modern theology, not least on account of the challenge of the Enlightenment to establish reliable and universal foundations for knowledge. However, recent philosophical critiques of the Enlightenment have called into question whether any such “universal” foundations of knowledge actually exist. Might theology be hitching its wagons to a dead horse? Furthermore, as Jeffrey Stout of Princeton University once pointed out, “preoccupation with method is like clearing your throat: it can go on for only so long before you lose your audience.”

There has thus been a reaction against the contemporary preoccupation with method, especially within postliberalism (see pp. 78–9). Writers such as Hans Frei (1922–88), George Lindbeck (born 1923), and Ronald Thiemann (1946–2012) have argued that Christian faith is like a language: either you speak it or you don't. Christianity is viewed as one option in a pluralist context, with no need to appeal to universal criteria or principles of argument. To its opponents, this represents little more than a lapse into some kind of fideism – that is, a system that is justified by its own internal standards, which need not be shared or approved by anyone else.

Commitment and Neutrality in Theology

To what extent should theologians be “committed?” To put this question in an especially pointed way: can Christian theology be taught or appreciated by someone who is not a Christian? Is commitment to the Christian faith an essential qualification for anyone who wants to teach or study Christian theology?

This question has been discussed at length within the Christian tradition. The debate is usually regarded as having got fully under way in the twelfth century, with the founding of the University of Paris. Public confrontations developed between thinkers who believed that theology was about a committed defense of the Christian faith (Bernard of Clairvaux, 1090–1153), and those who insisted that theology was an academic discipline, demanding detachment on the part of its practitioners (Peter Abelard). Significantly, the former tended to be based in monasteries and the latter in universities. The debate remains unresolved, in that each view has a number of significant arguments in its favor. The following are the main points put forward by each side. First, let us consider two arguments for detachment and neutrality.

1. A total detachment on the part of a scholar is necessary in the quest for truth. If a scholar is already committed to a theory (such as the truth of Christianity), this will prejudice his or her evaluation of the material to be studied. The Enlightenment advocated the idea of a disinterested, skeptical inquirer, and questioned whether the ideas “commitment” and “truth” were mutually compatible. The only person who is intellectually qualified to pass judgment on the Christian faith is someone who is neutral toward it, not someone who is committed to it.

2. Theology must be prepared to ask hard questions about its own intellectual credibility, methods, and ideas. The critical environment of a modern university forces theologians to ask the hard questions that otherwise might not get asked. Thus Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–2014) argues that theology needs to be present in a university context, in order that it may be confronted by – and respond to – critical questions. A similar approach is taken by the American Catholic theologian David Tracy (born 1939), who stresses that Christianity needs to ground Christian truth claims in public, universal norms of intelligibility and justification.

Having considered two of the arguments advocated for neutrality, we may now note three in support of commitment.

1. Latin American liberation theologians have been scathing about the notion of “academic detachment,” regarding this as a severe hindrance to the cause of social justice and political transformation. If something is true, ought one not to be committed to it? Basing their arguments partly on Marxist principles and partly on some fairly traditional Christian ideas, liberation theologians have argued that there is no tension between truth and commitment: indeed, the former demands the latter.
2. Scholarship is in reality precommitted to certain ideas and values, whether these are explicitly identified or not. As the French sociologist Pierre Bourdieu (1930–2002) pointed out, “the prestructured lies everywhere.” Might not the same be true of theology? Even those who claim to be “detached” might, in reality, turn out to be servants of hidden precommitments and presuppositions.
3. Christian theology arises in response to the faith of a community. It is, to use the celebrated phrase of Anselm of Canterbury, fides quaerens intellectum, “faith seeking understanding” (see p. 84). Faith thus implies commitment. To study Christian theology as a purely academic subject, from a disinterested standpoint, is to lose sight of the fact that Christianity is about proclamation, prayer, and worship. It is these activities that give rise to theology – and, if a theologian does not proclaim the faith, pray to God, and worship the risen Christ, he or she cannot really be said to have understood what theology is all about.

Each of these arguments for and against neutrality has its strengths and weaknesses. For example, consider the suggestion that only someone outside the Christian faith can provide a reliable account of its ideas; that is, that the person best qualified to write about Christian theology is someone who is not a Christian. This suggestion has its strengths. An outside observer is more likely to ask hard questions, to make critical judgments, and to notice the strangeness of things which those inside the Christian faith take as self-evident. Yet, because the outside observer does not share the inner dynamics of the Christian faith – such as its life of prayer or worship – he or she will not be able to understand the motivation for theological development. A critical perspective is achieved at the cost of a lack of understanding.

For reasons such as these, the debate about commitment in theology has found itself at something of a stalemate. In recent decades, however, a social development has taken place which is tending to lead to Christian theology being studied in seminaries, rather than universities – and hence in a committed context. With the rise of multiculturalism in Europe, North America, and Australia, there has been increasing disquiet within secular circles over the privileged status of Christian theology in the universities. Why should Christian – and not Jewish or Islamic – thought be given this special status?

As mentioned above, the result of this development in the United States has been the birth of “faculties of religion” or “faculties of religious studies,” which aim to study a variety of specific religions, or religion in general, rather than Christianity. As most individuals studying Christian theology do so with a view to ordination, the result of this has tended to be an exodus of students to the seminaries, where Christian theology is taught. Thus a number of significant recent theologians – including major European Catholic theologians such as Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88) and Yves Congar (1904–95) – have never held university appointments. Equally, many modern American evangelical theologians prefer to remain in seminary contexts rather than work within the “religious studies” faculties of secular universities.

Orthodoxy and Heresy

The terms “orthodoxy” and “heresy” have now largely lost their original theological meanings. The rise of anti-authoritarian attitudes in modern times has led to “orthodoxy” (that is, literally, “right opinion”) being seen as little more than “a dogma imposed upon people by coercive authority,” with “heresy” often being viewed as the victim of suppression by intolerant church or state authorities. As we shall see, Walter Bauer (1877–1960) advanced the thesis that forms of Christianity which later generations regarded as “heretical” were actually earlier and more influential than “orthodox” views; the Roman church deliberately suppressed these ideas, declaring them to be heretical, and enforced its own less popular ideas as “orthodoxy.” Recent scholarship has cast considerable doubt on this thesis, although it remains popular in more liberal circles.

It should be noted that heresy has often been associated with marginalized social groupings: for example, the Donatists (a separatist group in late fourth-century North Africa; see pp. 358–60) drew their support mainly from the indigenous Berber people of the region, whereas their Catholic opponents were mainly Roman colonial settlers. While the Christian church has frequently fallen into the temptation of suppressing its opponents, inside and outside its ranks, the notion of “heresy” is and remains of genuine theological importance, and needs to be examined more closely. In what follows, we shall consider both historical and theological aspects of the ideas of heresy and orthodoxy.

Historical Aspects

The ideas of “orthodoxy” and “heresy” are especially associated with the early church. So how did they develop? Are we to think of heresy as a degeneration from orthodoxy? In his study Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (1934), the German historian Walter Bauer argued that the basic unity within the early Christian churches did not seem to be located at the level of doctrines but at the level of relationship with the same Lord. Christian unity lay in the worship of the same Lord, rather than in the formal statement of doctrine (which is how “orthodoxy” tends to be defined).

Bauer went on to argue that a variety of views which were tolerated in the early church gradually began to be regarded with suspicion by the later church. An orthodox consensus began to emerge in which opinions that had once been tolerated were discarded as inadequate. But how was this distinction between heresy and orthodoxy drawn? Bauer argued that “orthodoxy” was the result of the growing power of Rome, which increasingly came to impose its own views upon others, using the term “heresy” to refer to views it rejected. Bauer's argument is that, to him, the difference between orthodoxy and heresy often seems arbitrary. Bauer's hostility to the idea of doctrinal norms reflects his conviction that these were a late development within Christianity.

Bauer's account has been subjected to devastating criticism in recent years, and it is uncertain whether it has a viable future. Historically, it is clear that early Christian communities were engaged in a quest for authenticity, which involved exploring various ways of conceptualizing and expressing the core themes of faith. It is beyond doubt that some early attempts to do this were rejected by later generations. This, however, seems to have little to do with power or authority and more to do with the need to find the best way of expressing the core themes of faith.

Theological Aspects

The debate over the historical origins of the notions of heresy and orthodoxy might suggest that the ideas are of purely antiquarian interest. In fact, there is a continuing theological significance associated with the ideas. Heresy is important theologically. This point is perhaps best seen from one of the most important discussions of heresy, found in F. D. E. Schleiermacher's Christian Faith (first edition, 1821–2). Schleiermacher argued that heresy was what preserved the appearance of Christianity, yet contradicted its essence:

If the distinctive essence of Christianity consists in the fact that in it all religious emotions are related to the redemption wrought by Jesus Christ, there will be two ways in which heresy can arise. That is to say: This fundamental formula will be retained in general [...] but either human nature will be so defined that redemption in the strict case cannot be accomplished, or the Redeemer will be defined in such a way that he cannot accomplish redemption.

Schleiermacher's discussion of heresy is of such interest that we shall consider it in detail, partly because it illuminates the distinction between heresy and unbelief and partly because it shows the continuing need for the notion of “heresy” in theology, even if the word itself risks becoming discredited through overuse.

Schleiermacher argues that the central and distinctive idea of Christianity is that God has redeemed us through Jesus Christ, and through no one else and in no other way. It must therefore follow that the Christian understandings of God, Jesus Christ, and human nature should be consistent with this doctrine of redemption. To give some obvious applications of this point:

1. The Christian understanding of the nature of God must be such that God can effect the redemption of humanity through Christ.
2. The Christian understanding of the identity of Christ must be such that God can bring about our redemption through him, and him alone.

3. The Christian understanding of humanity must be such that redemption is both possible and genuine.

In other words, it is essential that the Christian understanding of God, Christ, and humanity is consistent with the principle of redemption through Christ alone.

According to Schleiermacher, to deny that God has redeemed us through Jesus Christ is to deny the most fundamental truth claim of the Christian faith. The distinction between what is Christian and what is not lies in whether this principle is accepted. The distinction between what is orthodox and what is heretical, however, lies in how this principle, once conceded and accepted, is understood. In other words, heresy is not a form of unbelief; it is a faulty or inadequate understanding of core Christian beliefs that arises within the context of faith itself. For Schleiermacher, heresy is fundamentally an inadequate or inauthentic form of Christian faith.

On the basis of his analysis of the theme of redemption in Christ, Schleiermacher identifies four heresies that arise from an inadequate grasp of the doctrine of redemption, as follows:

1. Ebionitism, which interprets the person of Christ in such a way that he does not possess the essential superiority to humanity which makes Christ, and Christ alone, our redeemer.
2. Docetism, which interprets the person of Christ in such a way that he only has the appearance of being human, and thus lacks the capacity to relate to us that is essential to redemption.
3. Pelagianism, which sees humanity as capable of securing its own redemption, and hence not needing Christ.
4. Manicheism, which sees humanity as incapable of responding to the salvation made possible in Christ.

The four heresies described above may, according to Schleiermacher, be regarded as the four “natural heresies” of the Christian faith, each of which arises through an inadequate interpretation of the doctrine of redemption in Christ. It is no accident that these were by far the most important heresies to be debated in the early church.

Schleiermacher thus holds that heresy is ultimately an inadequate or incoherent way of conceiving the Christian faith. It retains the outward forms of orthodoxy while proving incapable of sustaining the theological weight necessary to support core themes of faith. This has proved to be a fruitful way of thinking about heresy and has been developed further by more recent writers (see, for example, my own Heresy, 2009).

The Theology of the Relationship Between Christianity and Secular Culture

Theology is undertaken in a context – that of culture at large. The word “culture” is not especially easy to define. In his work Christianity and Civilization (1948), the Swiss theologian Emil Brunner defined culture as “the materialization of meaning.” A study of church history strongly suggests that the Christian church is engaged in a perennial struggle to clarify its relationship with culture. Where should Christians see themselves as located? Inside the culture? Or outside it? Should they ignore it? Or isolate themselves from it? Or should they try to transform it? And, more importantly, what is the theological basis for these attitudes? How does what people believe about the essence of the Christian gospel affect their attitudes toward culture?

While these debates have taken place throughout Christian history, they were of especial importance in the patristic period. One of the most important controversies in the early church concerned the extent to which Christians could appropriate the immense cultural legacy of the classical world – poetry, philosophy, and literature. In what way could the ars poetica (“the poetic art”) be adopted and adapted by Christian writers, anxious to use such classical modes of writing to expound and communicate their faith? Or was the very use of such a literary medium tantamount to compromising the essentials of the Christian faith? Should Christianity turn its back on the classical heritage or appropriate it, even if in a modified form? In view of its importance and interest, we shall cite extensively from some of the most important writings offered as contributions to this debate.

Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165)

One early answer to this important question was given by Justin Martyr, a second-century writer with a particular concern to exploit the parallels between Christianity and Platonism as a means of communicating the gospel. For Justin, the seeds of divine wisdom had been sown throughout the world, which meant that Christians could and should expect to find aspects of the gospel reflected outside the church. For Justin, Christians were therefore at liberty to draw upon classical culture, in the knowledge that whatever “has been said well” ultimately draws upon divine wisdom and insight.

Important though Justin's argument may have been, it received a somewhat frosty reception in most sections of the Christian church. The main difficulty was that it was seen to virtually equate Christianity with classical culture by failing to articulate adequate grounds for distinguishing them, apparently suggesting that Christian theology and Platonism were simply different ways of viewing the same divine realities. Justin's pupil Tatian (c.120–c.180) was skeptical concerning the merits of classical rhetoric and poetry, both of which he regarded as encouraging deception and a disregard for matters of truth.

The most severe criticism of this kind of approach was to be found in the writings of Tertullian, a third-century Roman lawyer who converted to Christianity. What, he asked, has Athens to do with Jerusalem? What relevance has the Platonic Academy for the church? The manner in which the question is posed makes Tertullian's answer clear: Christianity must maintain its distinctive identity by avoiding such secular influences. This wholesale rejection of every aspect of pagan culture had the advantage of being simple to understand.

Christianity, according to Tertullian, was basically a countercultural movement which refused to allow itself to be contaminated in any way by the mental or moral environment in which it took root.

Yet there were difficulties with this consistently negative approach. It seemed to deny Christians access to or use of any of the intellectual and cultural heritage of the classical era even for the thoroughly laudable purpose of preaching of the gospel. Many early Christian writers studied classical rhetoric as a means of improving their preaching and writing, and thus facilitated the communication of the faith to those outside the church. Was Tertullian excluding this?

The matter became of greater significance with the conversion of the Roman emperor Constantine (272–337; reigned 306–37), which opened the way to a much more positive evaluation of the relation of every aspect of Christian life and thought to classical culture. In view of the importance of this development, we need to explore the background to it in a little detail. Since it had first established a significant presence at Rome in the fifth decade ad, Christianity had had a decidedly ambiguous legal status. On the one hand, it was not legally recognized and so did not enjoy any special rights; on the other, it was not forbidden. However, its growing numerical strength led to periodic attempts to suppress it by force. Sometimes these persecutions were local, restricted to regions such as North Africa; sometimes they were sanctioned throughout the Roman empire as a whole.

Under such conditions, it is hardly surprising that many Christians felt negatively toward classical Roman culture. This was the culture of an oppressor, determined to eliminate Christianity. It was easy to see the force of Tertullian's arguments under these circumstances. To adopt Roman cultural norms could be seen as a betrayal of the Christian faith.

With the conversion of Constantine in 313, the issue of the interaction of Christianity and classical culture assumed a new significance. Rome was now the servant of the gospel; might not the same be true of its culture? If the Roman state could be viewed positively by Christians, why not also its cultural heritage? It seemed as if a door had opened upon some very interesting possibilities. Prior to 313, this situation could only have been dreamed of. After 313, its exploration became a matter of urgency for leading Christian thinkers.

Augustine of Hippo developed an approach which is best described as the “critical appropriation of classical culture.” For Augustine, the situation was comparable to the people of Israel fleeing from captivity in Egypt at the time of the Exodus. Although they left the idols of Egypt behind them, they carried the gold and silver of Egypt with them, in order to make better and proper use of such riches, which were thus liberated in order to serve a higher purpose than before. In much the same way, the philosophy and culture of the ancient world could be appropriated by Christians, where this seemed right, and thus allowed to serve the cause of the Christian faith. Augustine clinched his argument by pointing out how several recent distinguished Christians had made use of classical wisdom in advancing the gospel:

If those who are called philosophers, particularly the Platonists, have said anything which is true and consistent with our faith, we must not reject it, but claim it for our own use, in the knowledge that they possess it unlawfully. The Egyptians possessed idols and heavy burdens, which the children of Israel hated and from which they fled; however, they also possessed vessels of gold and silver and clothes which our forebears, in leaving Egypt, took for themselves in secret, intending to use them in a better manner [Exodus 3: 21–2; 12: 35–6]. [...] In the same way, pagan learning is not entirely made up of false teachings and superstitions. [...] It contains also some excellent teachings, well suited to be used by truth, and excellent moral values. Indeed, some truths are even found among them which relate to the worship of the one God. Now these are, so to speak, their gold and their silver, which they did not invent themselves, but which they dug out of the mines of the providence of God, which are scattered throughout the world, yet which are improperly and unlawfully prostituted to the worship of demons. The Christian, therefore, can separate these truths from their unfortunate associations, take them away, and put them to their proper use for the proclamation of the gospel.

The fundamental theme is that of taking a way of thinking – or writing, or speaking – which had hitherto been put to pagan use and liberating it so that it might be put to the service of the gospel. Augustine argues that what are essential, neutral, yet valuable ways of thinking or self-expression have been quarried in “the mines of the providence of God”; the difficulty is the use to which they were put within pagan culture, in that they had been “improperly and unlawfully prostituted to the worship of demons.”

Augustine's approach thus laid the foundation for the assertion that whatever was good, true, or beautiful could be used in the service of the gospel. It was this approach that would prove dominant in the western church, providing a theological foundation for the critical appropriation by Christian writers of literary genres whose origins lay outside the church. In addition to literary forms already known within the church, and widely recognized as entirely appropriate in Christian usage – such as the sermon and the biblical commentary – might be added others, whose cultural pedigree was thoroughly secular. Examples would include drama and – to anticipate a later development – the novel.

The scene was thus set for the creative interaction of Christian theology, liturgy, and spirituality with the cultural tradition of the ancient world – unquestionably one of the most interesting and fertile examples of cultural cross-fertilization in human intellectual history.

The Twentieth Century: H. Richard Niebuhr (1894–1962)

As noted earlier, theologians have debated the relationship between Christianity and culture for the past two thousand years. In recent years, a theological framework developed by the American writer H. Richard Niebuhr has found wide acceptance as a useful tool for reflection on this issue. In his highly influential Christ and Culture (1951), Niebuhr set out five theological paradigms or frameworks. This book was originally based on lectures given at Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Texas, in January and February 1949. These five paradigms are to be seen as “ideal types.” It is important to note that no individual person or group will conform to them exactly, and representatives of one type will often show characteristics of others. The five approaches identified by Niebuhr are the following:

1. Christ against culture. This view encourages opposition, total separation, and hostility toward culture. The values of the kingdom of God, on this view, stand in contrast to those of the world. As we have seen, Tertullian could be included in this category; Niebuhr also includes the world-renouncing Russian writer Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910), and Anabaptist writers such as Menno Simons (1496–1551). Anabaptist writers stressed the need to form alternative Christian communities, often in rural areas. They refused to have anything to do with secular power or authority, rejecting the use of force. A tension can be discerned at this point between radical writers and the mainstream reformers (such as Luther and Calvin), who encouraged a more positive and interactive approach to society and culture. Similar attitudes can be found within North American Protestant fundamentalist circles today

2. Christ of culture. This approach is more or less the direct opposite of the “Christ against culture” view: it attempts to bring culture and Christianity together, regardless of their differences. A world-affirming approach can be found in nineteenth-century German liberal Protestantism, which tended to amalgamate German culture with Christian ideals. Liberal Protestantism was inspired by the vision of a humanity which was ascending upward into new realms of progress and prosperity. The doctrine of evolution gave new vitality to this belief, which was nurtured by strong evidence of cultural stability in western Europe in the late nineteenth century. Liberation and feminist theologies are current examples of a similar trend.
3. Christ above culture. This position attempts to correlate the fundamental questions of culture with the answer of Christian revelation. The famous maxim of Thomas Aquinas can be seen as underlying this approach: “Grace does not abolish nature, but perfects it.”
4. Christ and culture in paradox. This model rests on what could be described as a “dualist” approach, which holds that the Christian belongs to “two realms (the spiritual and temporal)” and must therefore live in the tension of fulfilling responsibilities to both. Niebuhr saw the sixteenth-century German reformer Martin Luther as an excellent representative of this understanding of the relationship between Christianity and culture. According to this model, the Christian community must expect to live in a degree of tension with the world. Luther set out this tension in terms of his doctrine of the “two kingdoms” – the “kingdom of the world” and the “kingdom of God.” These two very different realms of authority coexist and overlap, with the result that Christians experience the tension of living in one kingdom while trying to obey the authority of another.

5. Christ the transformer of culture. This model includes “conversionists” who attempt to convert the values and goals of secular culture into the service of the kingdom of God. We have already seen that Augustine of Hippo belongs in this category. John Calvin, John Wesley (1703–91), and Jonathan Edwards take similar positions.

Niebuhr's approach has been criticized on many grounds. For a start, it is easy to think of other categories that need to be included. Liberation theology doesn't really fit into any of these five categories. Furthermore, Niebuhr uses the word “culture” in a rather restrictive way, which fails to account for the fact that many Christians endorse some aspects of culture (e.g., social outreach and compassion) while rejecting others (e.g., pornography). This is not on account of an inconsistent attitude toward culture, but because culture is complex!

For Niebuhr, the importance of clarifying the theological relationship between faith and culture had been given new importance by the Second World War, which had only recently come to an end. Western culture has changed considerably since then, leading many theologians to wonder whether Niebuhr's five categories have now outlived their usefulness. Yet they are still widely cited in theological literature, and remain helpful – within limits! – in describing the main approaches to culture found within Christian theology.

In this chapter, we have explored a number of issues that are preparatory to engaging with the study of theology. The aim has been, in effect, to clear the ground a little, before we move on to deal with specific issues of substance relating to theology. We are now ready to move on to the next chapter, which considers the sources of Christian theology.

Questions for Chapter 5

1. Critique the following definition of theology: "Theology is talk about God." What are its strengths and weaknesses?
2. What difficulties with the idea of theology as an academic discipline lie behind the growing interest in spirituality within the churches and seminaries?
3. Explain the role played by the following in the development of theology: Peter Lombard's Sentences, John Calvin's Institutes, F. D. E. Schleiermacher's Christian Faith.
4. Do you have to be a Christian to be a Christian theologian?
5. Is the notion of "heresy" now an outdated irrelevance for Christian theology?
6. How do you assess Augustine of Hippo's understanding of the relationship between Christianity and culture?

THE SOURCES OF THEOLOGY

Christian theology, like most disciplines, draws upon a number of sources. There has been considerable discussion within the Christian tradition concerning the identity of these sources, their relative importance for theological analysis, and how they are to be used in theological reflection. The present chapter aims to explore the identity of these sources and to provide an assessment of their potential for a constructive theology.

Broadly speaking, four main sources have been acknowledged within the Christian tradition. These are sometimes referred to as the “Wesleyan Quadrilateral” and are characteristic of Methodism, which is based on the writings of John Wesley (1703–91). Wesley held that the living core of the Christian faith was revealed in Scripture, illuminated by tradition, brought to life in personal experience, and confirmed by reason. Yet, although Wesley is an example of a theologian who integrated all four sources of theology, these are best seen as representative of Christian theology as a whole, rather than any specific denomination or school. The major questions concern how these four sources – as listed below – relate to one another.

1. Scripture (also known as “the Bible”)
2. tradition
3. reason
4. religious experience.

Though not regarded as being of equal importance, each of these sources has a distinct contribution to make within the discipline of theology and will be considered in detail in what follows.

Scripture

The terms “Bible” and “Scripture,” along with the derived adjectives “biblical” and “scriptural,” are virtually interchangeable. Both designate a body of texts which are recognized as having authority for Christian thinking. The unusual word “Bible” needs explanation. Like many words in modern English, it derives from a Greek original. The Greek phrase which has been rendered into English is ta biblia – literally, “the books.” This Greek phrase is plural, and refers to the collection of books, or writings, regarded as authoritative by Christians. It must be stressed that the Bible is not merely the object of formal academic study within Christianity; it is also read and expounded within the context of public worship, and is the subject of meditation and devotion on the part of individual Christians. We begin by considering the major components of the Christian Bible.

The Old Testament

The term “Old Testament” is used by Christian writers to refer to those books of the Christian Bible which were (and still are) regarded as sacred by Judaism. For Christians, the Old Testament is seen as setting the scene for the coming of Jesus of Nazareth, who brings its leading themes and institutions to fulfillment. Early Christians – including Jesus himself and many of the writers of the New Testament – simply used the word “scripture” or “writing” (Greek: graphē) to refer to what is now known as the Old Testament. It is not clear when this specific way of referring to these books became established.

These texts, of course, continue to be held as sacred by Jews to this day. This means that the same collection of texts is referred to in different ways by different groups. This has led to some proposals for renaming this collection of texts, none of which has gained general acceptance. Three may be noted.

1. The Hebrew Bible. This way of referring to the Old Testament stresses the fact that it was written in Hebrew and is sacred to the Hebrew people. However, it fails to do justice to the way in which Christianity sees an essential continuity between the Old and New Testaments. A minor difficulty is also caused by the fact that parts of the Old Testament are written in Aramaic, rather than Hebrew.

2. The First Testament. This way of referring to the collection of texts avoids using the word “old,” which is held by some to be pejorative. “Old,” it is argued, means “outdated” or “invalid.” Referring to the Old Testament as the “First Testament” and the New as the “Second Testament” stresses the continuity between the two collections of texts.
3. Tanakh – an acronym of the Hebrew words for “law,” “prophets,” and “writings” (torah, nevi'im, and ketuvim), which is the standard Jewish description of the works that Christians call the “Old Testament.” This is perfectly acceptable for use within Judaism but does not reflect the specifically Christian understanding of continuity between the people of Israel and the church.

There is presently no generally accepted alternative to the traditional term “Old Testament,” which will therefore be used throughout this study. Nevertheless, readers should be aware of the alternatives and the issues that led to their being proposed.

The New Testament

The New Testament, which consists of 27 books, is considerably shorter than the Old Testament. It is written entirely in a late form of Greek (often referred to as koinē, from the Greek word for “common” or “everyday”) that was widely spoken in the eastern Mediterranean world of that time. The New Testament opens with the four gospels: Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The word “gospel” basically means “good news.” Each of the four gospel writers – or “evangelists,” as they are sometimes known – sets out the basic events lying behind the good news. These four books describe the life of Jesus Christ, which reaches its climax in his resurrection, and present his teachings.

This is followed by an account of the expansion of Christianity. How were events described in the gospels received at the time? How did the gospel spread from Palestine to Europe? These questions are addressed in the fifth work to be found in the New Testament, the full title of which is “the Acts of the Apostles” but which is more usually referred to simply as “Acts.” The gospel of Luke and Acts are widely agreed to have been written by the same person: Luke.

The next major section of material in the New Testament comprises the letters, sometimes still referred to by the older English word “epistles.” These letters provide teaching concerning both Christian beliefs and behavior, and are an important witness to the emerging doctrinal consensus about the identity and significance of Jesus Christ, the central figure of the Christian faith.

Most of these letters were written by Paul, whose conversion to the Christian faith led him to undertake a major program of evangelism and church-planting. Many of his letters were written to churches he had planted, giving them advice. Other letters are attributed to the apostles Peter and John. These letters should not be thought of primarily as doctrinal textbooks but rather as living testimonies to every aspect of the Christian faith which include doctrinal teaching along with moral guidance and spiritual encouragement. The term “pastoral letters” is sometimes used to refer to the two letters Paul addressed to Timothy and to his letter to Titus, which deal particularly with issues of pastoral importance.

The New Testament then ends with the book of Revelation (sometimes also known as “the Apocalypse”), which offers a vision of the end of history in which the writer is allowed to see into heaven and gain a glimpse of the new Jerusalem.

Other Works: Deutero-Canonical and Apocryphal Writings

The adjective “canonical” is often used to refer to Scripture. This term, deriving from the Greek word kanōn (meaning “rule,” “norm,” or “yardstick”), is used to indicate that limits have been set by the consensus of the Christian community to the texts that may be regarded as “scriptural” and hence as authoritative for Christian theology. A long-standing debate between Catholic and Protestant theologians concerns the status of a further group of texts which are often referred to as “apocryphal” or “deutero-canonical.”

A comparison of the contents of the Old Testament in the Hebrew Bible, on the one hand, and the Greek and Latin versions (such as the Septuagint or Vulgate), on the other, shows that the latter contain a number of works not found in the former. Following the lead of Jerome (c.347–420), the sixteenth-century reformers argued that the only Old Testament writings that could be regarded as belonging to the canon of Scripture were those originally included in the Hebrew Bible.

A distinction was thus drawn between the “Old Testament” and the “Apocrypha”: the former consisted of works found in the Hebrew Bible, while the latter consisted of works found in the Greek and Latin Bibles but not in the Hebrew Bible. While some reformers allowed that the apocryphal works were edifying reading, there was general agreement that these works could not be used as the basis of Christian theology. In 1546, the Council of Trent defined the Old Testament as “those Old Testament works contained in the Greek and Latin Bibles,” thus eliminating any distinction between “Old Testament” and “Apocrypha.”

In practice, this distinction is not as significant as might at first seem to be the case. An examination of the sixteenth-century debates over the matter suggests that the only theological issue of any real importance which was linked to this question was whether it was proper to pray for the dead. The (apocryphal) books of the Maccabees encourage this practice, which Protestant theologians were not inclined to accept.

The issue that remains of real theological significance today concerns the canon of Scripture. Does the fact that the church drew up the canon imply that the church has authority over Scripture? Or did the church merely recognize and give formal assent to an authority which the canonical Scriptures already possessed? Does the process of shaping the canon of Scripture reflect the imposition of the external authority of the church upon the Bible or the recognition by the church of the intrinsic authority of the Bible? The former position is particularly attractive to Catholic, and the latter to Protestant, scholars.

First, the book in question is identified (note that the term “book” is invariably used, even when the “book” in question is actually a letter). Box 6.2 Referring to books of the Bible

The standard method of referring to the Bible involves three elements. First, the book in question is identified (note that the term “book” is invariably used, even when the “book” in question is actually a letter). This is followed by the chapter of the book, and then the verse(s) within that chapter.

The book may be identified in a full or abbreviated form. The chapter may be given in Roman or Arabic numerals. The chapter and verse numbers are usually separated by a colon or period. However, occasionally the verse numbers are printed in superscript.

The following are all commonly encountered ways of referring to one of the most familiar sayings from St. Paul, which has become widely known as “the grace.”

Corinthians 13.14; II Corinthians xiii, 14; 2 Cor. 13¹⁴; 2 Co 13: 14

Note the following points:

1. It is not necessary to distinguish between the Old and New Testaments in referring to biblical works.
2. It is not necessary to identify the author of a biblical book when referring to it.

Box 6.3 Common terms used in relation to the Bible

Pentateuch The first five books of the Old Testament (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy).

Five books of the law The first five books of the Old Testament (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy).

Major prophets The first four prophetic writings of the Old Testament (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel).

Minor prophets The twelve remaining prophetic writings of the Old Testament (Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi).

Synoptic gospels The first three gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke).

Fourth Gospel The gospel of John.

Pastoral epistles (or letters) A way of referring collectively to 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, and Titus that takes note of their particular concern for pastoral matters and church order.

Catholic epistles (or letters) Those New Testament letters which are not explicitly addressed to individuals (James, 1 Peter, 2 Peter, 1 John, 2 John, 3 John, Jude). In older works, these are sometimes referred to as “epistles general.”

In practice, there has been increased recognition of late that the community of faith and Scripture, the people and the book, coexist with one another, and that attempts to draw sharp lines of distinction between them are somewhat arbitrary. The canon of Scripture may be regarded as emerging organically from a community of faith already committed to using and respecting it. We shall explore these issues further presently.

The Relationship Between the Old and New Testaments

The specifically Christian terms “Old Testament” and “New Testament” are strongly theological in nature. They rest upon the belief that the contents of the Old Testament belong to a period of God's dealings with the world which has in some way been superseded or fulfilled by the coming of Jesus Christ in the New Testament. Roughly the same collection of texts is referred to by Jewish writers as “the law, prophets, and writings” and by Christian writers as the “Old Testament.” There is thus no particular reason why someone who is not a Christian should feel obliged to refer to this collection of books as the Old Testament, apart from custom of use.

The Christian theological framework that leads to this distinction is that of “covenants” or “dispensations.” The basic Christian belief is that the coming of Christ inaugurated something new while still being continuous with God's earlier actions in history. This leads to the distinctively Christian attitude toward the Old Testament, which can be summarized in three principles:

1. Theological principles and ideas (such as the notion of a sovereign God who is active in human history) are reaffirmed by Christianity while sometimes being given a new focus – for example, by being specifically linked to the person of Jesus Christ.
2. Ethical principles – such as loving God and respecting the integrity of others – are reaffirmed by Christianity.
3. Cultic practices (such as circumcision, dietary laws, and sacrificial rites) are regarded as belonging to a past era in God's dealings with humanity, and are therefore no longer binding on Christians. For example, the Old Testament sacrificial system is seen as a “type” – that is, a “foreshadowing” or anticipation – of the sacrifice of Christ. Once that perfect sacrifice was made, the Old Testament sacrificial system became obsolete.

How, then, do the Old and New Testaments relate to one another, according to Christian theology? One radical option was developed by the second-century writer Marcion of Sinope (c.85–c.160), who became alienated from mainstream Roman Christianity in the year 144. Marcion argued that the Old Testament was the sacred text of a religion which had nothing to do with Christianity. According to Marcion, Christianity was a religion of love, which had no place whatsoever for the legalistic and violent God of the Old Testament. He believed that Christianity ought to sever all its links with Judaism, appealing to biblical texts such as Luke 5: 37: “no one puts new wine into old wineskins; otherwise the new wine will burst the skins and will be spilled, and the skins will be destroyed.” Christianity, he argued, should have nothing to do with the God, beliefs, and rituals of Judaism. According to Marcion, the purpose of Christ was to depose the Old Testament God (who bears a considerable resemblance to the Gnostic “demiurge,” a semidivine figure responsible for fashioning the world) and usher in the worship of the true God of grace. The third-century theologian Tertullian (c.160–c.220) summarized Marcion's core belief in terms of recognizing two quite different gods, “of unequal rank, the one a stern and warlike judge, the other gentle and mild, kind, and supremely good.”

There are faint echoes of this idea in the writings of Martin Luther (1483–1546). Although Luther insists that both the Old and the New Testaments relate to the actions of the same God, he nevertheless insists upon the total opposition of law and grace. Judaism, according to Luther, was totally preoccupied with the idea of justification by works, believing that it was possible to merit favor in the sight of God by one's achievements. The gospel, in contrast, emphasizes that justification is completely gratuitous, resting only on the grace of God. Although grace can be detected in the Old Testament (e.g., Isaiah 40–55), and law in the New (e.g., the Sermon on the Mount: Matthew 5–7), Luther often seemed to suggest that the Old Testament was primarily a religion of law, contrasted with the New Testament emphasis on grace.

The majority position within Christian theology has emphasized the continuity between the two testaments while affirming the distinction between them. John Calvin (1509–64) provides a lucid and typical discussion of their relationship. He argued that there is a fundamental similarity and continuity between the Old and New Testaments in three major respects. First, Calvin stresses the immutability of the divine will. God cannot do one thing in the Old Testament and follow it by doing something totally different in the New. There must be a fundamental continuity of action and intention between the two. Second, both testaments celebrate and proclaim the grace of God manifested in Jesus Christ. The Old Testament may only be able to witness to Jesus Christ “from a distance and darkly”; nevertheless, its witness to the coming of Christ is real. In the third place, both testaments possess the “same signs and sacraments,” bearing witness to the same grace of God.

Calvin thus argues that the two testaments are basically identical. They differ in administratio but not in substantia. In terms of their substance and content there is no radical discontinuity between them. The Old Testament happens to occupy a different chronological position in the divine plan of salvation from the New; its content (rightly understood), however, is the same. Calvin summarizes this general principle thus: “where the entire law is concerned, the gospel differs from it only in clarity of presentation.” Christ is revealed and the grace of the Holy Spirit is offered in both Old and New Testaments – but more clearly and more fully in the latter. This viewpoint is characteristic of mainstream Christianity. It can be found, for example, in the declarations of the Second Vatican Council, which affirms the importance of the Old Testament for Christians:

The Church of Christ acknowledges that in God's plan of salvation the beginning of her faith and election is to be found in the patriarchs, Moses and the prophets. She professes that all Christ's faithful, who as men of faith are sons of Abraham (cf. Galatians 3: 7), are included in the same patriarch's call and that the salvation of the Church is mystically prefigured in the exodus of God's chosen people from the land of bondage. On this account the Church cannot forget that she received the revelation of the Old Testament by way of that people with whom God in his inexpressible mercy established the ancient covenant.

The Canon of Scripture: Historical and Theological Issues

Earlier, we noted that one of the achievements of the patristic era was the gradual achievement of a consensus over what the term "Scripture" designated. The development of the notion of the "canon" (Greek: kanōn, "a rule" or "a norm") raises two interrelated questions. First, how did this actually happen? And, second, what theological principles were involved in this process? In this section, we shall consider both the historical and theological aspects of the formation of the New Testament canon.

Historical Issues

Historically, the formation of the New Testament canon was a continuous process of reception, in which Christian communities around the Mediterranean gradually came to a consensus over which religious writings they regarded as being normative. The historical evidence suggests that early Christians read quite widely, often failing to make any distinction between works that they considered to be "normative" and those that were simply "helpful." Local preferences can be identified: some churches, for example, regularly read works such as the Didache, the letters of Clement, and the Shepherd of Hermas. Gradually, however, a consensus emerged over a relatively narrow range of works that were seen as having universal relevance and authority, without in any way preventing local congregations from supplementing these with other sources. The "canon" was not a list of authorized documents imposed on a church but a formalization of the authority and utility of those documents that already enjoyed universal usage and approbation throughout the Christian world.

A widespread consensus appears to have emerged within the churches by the middle of the third century over the core elements of what we now call the “New Testament,” with lingering low-level disputes over four letters – 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude – which were seen as borderline cases by some church leaders and communities. This consensus was not imposed on Christian communities; indeed, where centralized decisions were made, these are best seen as the endorsement of an existing practice or consensus. Although later writers tried to set out criteria for determining whether a work was canonical (e.g., written by an apostle), the evidence suggests that earlier Christians did not really think in terms of “criteria of canonicity” but acted on the basis of how widely the documents were accepted and used.

Historically, the question of the limits of the canon proved to be a lot less important to the great theological debates of the first four centuries than might be expected. The Christological and trinitarian debates of this period often involved New Testament documents (particularly the four gospels) whose authority was already widely accepted. The doctrinal debates of this era made little reference to 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude, so that these demarcation disputes were actually less important for the development of Christian theology than might be thought.

Theological Issues

The theological aspects of the process of shaping the canon concern the roles of “receiving community” and “received text” within the process of reception. The historical process of shaping the canon involved decisions to exclude, as much as to include, certain texts. This clearly raises theological questions concerning the relationship between the community of faith and the New Testament, which continue to be significant in contemporary theological reflection. In choosing the New Testament canon, was the church exercising its authority over the texts? Or was the church discerning an existing authority within these texts? The first approach locates authority primarily with the church, the second primarily with the texts.

Three theological approaches to the issue of the relationship between community and text, church and Bible, have emerged over the history of Christian thought.

1. The church has authority over Scripture. This position, which tends to be associated with Catholic theologians, is often expressed in the words of Augustine of Hippo (354–430): “For my part, I should not believe the Gospel except as moved by the authority of the Catholic Church.” The authority of the biblical texts was determined by a process of reception, which involved an appeal to the apostolic tradition as the criterion of canonicity. “It was by the apostolic Tradition that the Church discerned which writings are to be included in the list of the sacred books” (Catechism of the Catholic Church).
2. Scripture has authority over the church. This position, which tends to be associated with Protestant theologians, holds that the church recognized an inner authoritative spiritual quality to biblical works, which they possessed independently of the church's decision to recognize them. John Calvin, for example, spoke of the secret (or internal) testimony of the Holy Spirit, which alone can authenticate inspired Scripture in the hearts of believers. In declaring a work “canonical,” the church thus responds to an internal quality of Scripture and does not impose its own judgment as an expression of its authority.
3. The church and Bible belong together, as an organic unity of community and text, making it impossible to allocate “authority” to either. This third position is often adopted by those who take the view that the historical process of the formation of the canon does not fit neatly into either of the two theological schemas already mentioned. Whether some place authority with the “people” and others with the “book,” this locates the issue at their intersection: “people and book.” This is not inconsistent with either of the previous two models, but sets each of them in an expanded context.

A further theological issue which should be noted here concerns the finality of the process of fixing the canon. Is the canon closed? Or is there still at least a theoretical possibility of adding new works or removing existing ones? Most Christian theologians take the view that the canon is now fixed, representing a final account of the documents that the church has recognized as witnessing authentically to its faith. In recent years, however, the rediscovery of Gnostic writings, such as the Coptic gospel of Thomas, has led some scholars to argue for the belated inclusion of such works. Others have rejected this as inappropriate, noting the late dates of these works, their partisan character, and their purely local influence.

The Word of God

The phrases “the Word of God” and “the Word of the Lord” are as deeply rooted in Christian worship as they are in Christian theology. “Word” implies action and communication. Just as a person's character and will are expressed through the words he or she uses, so Scripture (especially the Old Testament) understands God to address people, who are thus made aware of God's intentions and will for them.

The term “Word of God” is complex and highly nuanced, bringing together a cluster of ideas. Three broad, and clearly related, senses of the term may be discerned, both within the Christian tradition and within Scripture itself.

1. The phrase is used to refer to Jesus Christ as the Word of God made flesh (John 1: 14). This is the most highly developed use of the term in the New Testament. In speaking of Christ as the “Word of God incarnate,” Christian theology has attempted to express the idea that the will, purposes, and nature of God are made known in history through the person of Jesus Christ. It is the deeds, character, and theological identity of Jesus Christ, and not merely the words that he uttered, that make known the nature and purpose of God.

2. The term is also used to refer to “the gospel of Christ” or the “message or proclamation about Jesus.” In this sense, the term refers to what God achieved and made known through the life, death, and resurrection of Christ.
3. The term can be used in a general sense to refer to the whole Bible, which can be regarded as setting the scene for the advent of Christ, telling the story of his coming, and exploring the implications of his life, death, and resurrection for believers. For many Christians, the phrase “Word of God” is a theological alternative or equivalent to “the Bible.” This leaves open the question of whether the Bible is itself that “Word of God” or whether it contains or mediates this “Word of God.”

Karl Barth's (1886–1968) use of the phrase “the Word of God” is widely discussed in contemporary theological reflection. Barth offers a theological (as opposed to an historical or literary) account of the place of Scripture in the church, grounding it in the notion of God's self-revelation in Christ. Barth's doctrine of “the threefold form of the Word of God” distinguishes a threefold movement consisting of the Word of God embodied in Christ, the witness to this Word in Scripture, and finally the proclamation of this Word in the preaching of the community of faith. There is thus a direct and organic connection between the preaching of the church and the person of Jesus Christ.

There are some difficulties with this position. Some more conservative Protestants have found difficulty with Barth's emphatic assertion that Scripture itself is not to be directly identified with divine revelation. For Barth, Scripture is a “witness to” or a “token of” that revelation. Yet Barth also insists that revelation does not “bypass” this witness. This witness becomes revelation when God speaks through it. Does this reduce biblical authority to our subjective reception of the divine address that confronts us through the human words of the Bible? Barth certainly did not think so, although some of his critics have interpreted him in this manner.

Narrative Theology

Social anthropologists, sociologists, philosophers of history, and literary theorists have all emphasized that human beings find it natural to use stories to explore fundamental questions of meaning.

[We] are animals who must fundamentally understand what reality is, who we are, and how we ought to live by locating ourselves within the larger narratives and metanarratives that we hear and tell, and that constitute what is for us real and significant.

The literary form which dominates Scripture is that of narrative. The Bible narrates a series of stories which disclose the nature and character of God, and the shape of the redemption achieved through Christ. The story of the calling of Abraham, the exodus from Egypt, the exile in Babylon, and the coming of Jesus Christ are all seen as individual parts of the greater narrative that discloses God's nature and purposes. So what implications does this observation have for relating Scripture to theology? The recently developed concept of narrative theology has much to say on this theme.

Narrative theology is based on the observation that the Bible tells stories about God. These stories “render” or disclose the nature and character of God. For example, the Old Testament tells and retells the story of how God led the people of Israel out of Egypt into the promised land, and all that this implies for the people of God. In a similar way, the New Testament is also dominated by a story of God's redeeming action in history, this time centering on the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. What does this story mean for Christians? How does it affect the way in which they think and act? It is helpful to think of Paul's letters, for example, as systematic attempts to spell out the relevance of the story of Jesus Christ for Christians – how it affects the way they think and the way they behave.

Enlightenment biblical interpreters regarded the narrative structure of Scripture as an irritation, and aimed to extract propositional truths from it. In his landmark work The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative (1974), Hans Frei (1922–88) pointed out this tendency, and noted that the waning of the Enlightenment meant that its prejudice against narrative need no longer be theologically decisive. The way was clear to reappropriate biblical narratives as a way of conveying divine revelation.

This development lies behind the emergence of “narrative theology,” especially in the writings of postliberal writers such as Hans Frei, George Lindbeck (born 1923), and Stanley Hauerwas (born 1940). It must, however, be stressed that narrative theology is by no means a well-defined movement, and is probably better thought of as a theological trend rather than a well-defined school. The importance of narrative is also evident from Christian literary writers, such as J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973) and C. S. Lewis (1898–1963), both of whom developed sophisticated theories of narrative to allow them to explore theological themes, such as the meaning of the incarnation and resurrection.

The role of biblical narratives was of central importance to the “demythologization” debate of the 1940s and 1950s. The New Testament scholar Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) argued that the New Testament was influenced by outdated myths, such as a belief in a three-decker universe. It was necessary to get rid of these myths, first because they were outdated and second because they were narratives. In their place, Bultmann urged the adoption of an existential philosophical framework.

C. S. Lewis, one of Bultmann's more severe critics, argued that this was impossible. “We are invited to restate our belief in a form free from metaphor and symbol. The reason why we don't is that we can't.” For Lewis, Christianity was best understood as a “true myth,” and could not be framed in other ways without loss of its capacity to render the world truthfully and realistically. It was impossible to eliminate narrative, metaphor, and imagery from the Christian proclamation without deforming and distorting it.

What, then, are the advantages and drawbacks of such an approach? Why has it gained such a following in academic theology? The following points are important in understanding the appeal of this approach, especially among writers concerned to reclaim the centrality of Scripture in modern theology.

1. Narrative is the main literary type found in Scripture. To approach theology from a narrative point of view is, potentially, to be much more faithful to Scripture itself than to take a more theoretical approach. C. S. Lewis, for example, argued that the Christian story was of primary importance whereas Christian doctrines were of secondary importance, in that they were derived from the story. Whereas the story appealed to the imagination, the doctrines appealed to the intellect. The narrative approach thus avoids the dulling sense of “abstraction” which is often claimed to be a feature of much academic theological writing.
2. Narrative theology affirms that God meets us in history and speaks to us as one who has been involved in history. The doctrine of the incarnation affirms that the story of Jesus Christ is also the story of God. Narrative theology declares that God really became involved in our world of space and time, that God really entered into history, that God really came to meet us where we are. Often, systematic theology creates the impression that God has presented us with a set of ideas, as if revelation were some kind of data bank (see pp. 137–8). Narrative theology enables us to recover the central insight that God became involved in our history. God's story intersects with our story. We can understand our story by relating it to the story of God, as we read it in Scripture. This aspect of narrative theology has had a considerable impact, most strikingly in the field of ethics. Stanley Hauerwas is perhaps the most distinguished of a group of ethical writers who have argued that the gospel narratives set out a pattern of behavior which is appropriate for Christian believers. The story of Jesus Christ, for example, is seen as establishing a pattern which is characteristic of the story of Christian believers. Ethics, approached from a narrative standpoint, becomes thoroughly grounded in real life. The gospel is not primarily about a set of ethical principles; it is about the effect of an encounter with God upon the lives of individuals and the histories of nations. By relating such stories, the biblical writers are able to declare: "This is the result of being transformed by the grace of God. That is an appropriate model for Christian behavior."

3. Recognition of the narrative character of Scripture allows us to appreciate how Scripture effectively conveys the tension between limited knowledge on the part of the human characters in the story and the omniscience of God. In his Art of Biblical Narrative (1981), Robert Alter (born 1935) makes this point as follows: "The biblical tale might usefully be regarded as a narrative experiment in the possibilities of moral, spiritual, and historical knowledge, undertaken through a process of studied contrasts between the variously limited knowledge of the human characters and the divine omniscience quietly but firmly represented by the narrator." Perhaps the book of Job illustrates this point with especial clarity in the Old Testament. The narrative structure of Scripture allows the reader to see the story from God's point of view, and appreciate the interplay between the human ignorance or misunderstanding of the situation and its reality, seen from God's point of view.

Methods of Interpretation of Scripture

Every text demands to be interpreted; Scripture is no exception. There is a sense in which the history of Christian theology can be regarded as the history of biblical interpretation. In what follows, we shall explore some of the approaches to biblical interpretation likely to be of interest to students of theology. It will, however, be clear that the vastness of the subject makes it impossible to do more than give a representative selection of approaches to the matter.

The first major approach to biblical interpretation that we need to consider is “typology,” which was widely used in the early church as a means of interpreting the Old Testament. The Greek word typos (usually translated simply as “type”) means something like a “figure,” “anticipation,” or “prototype.” Three main categories of types were identified: persons (such as Moses, seen as a type of Christ), events (such as the Exodus, seen as a type of redemption), and institutions (such as the people of Israel, seen as a type of the church). Whereas allegory relates primarily to biblical images, typology relates primarily to historical events or historical individuals.

One of the most important early examples of this typological approach is found in the “Homily on the Passover” by the second-century theologian Melito of Sardis (died c.180). Drawing on some passages in Paul's letters, Melito developed the idea that the Passover is to be seen as a “type” of the death of Christ. The Passover once celebrated in Egypt is to be seen as prefiguring “Christ our Passover” (1 Corinthians 5: 7), just as the passover lamb slain in Egypt is to be seen as a foreshadowing of the “Lamb slain from the foundation of the world” (Revelation 13: 8).

So what is the difference between “typology” and “allegory”? These are both ways of reading texts which allow deeper levels of meaning than permitted by a purely literal or historical reading. Scholars disagree about both what it means to speak of “typological” and “allegorical” readings of the Bible and whether these are equally acceptable. The present consensus could be summarized like this.

Typology is about “the correspondences between the events, the institutions, and the persons of the Old Testament and those of the New Testament” (Jean Daniélou). It involves interpreting events in the New Testament – especially relating to Jesus Christ – as representing the fulfillment of a similar situation recorded or prophesied in the Old Testament. Allegory generally involves using the words of the Old Testament as symbols or tokens of religious ideals or values, rather than events (such as the death and resurrection of Christ). Many scholars are concerned that allegory can all too easily become the reading of meaning into texts rather than the discovery of meaning within them.

Two major schools of interpretation emerged in the Greek-speaking church, one based at the great city of Alexandria, the other at Antioch. The Alexandrian school of biblical interpretation drew on the methods devised by the Jewish writer Philo of Alexandria (c.25 bc–c.ad 50) and earlier Jewish traditions, which allowed the literal interpretation of Scripture to be supplemented by an appeal to allegory. The Greek philosopher Heraclitus defined an allegory as “saying one thing, and meaning something other than what is said.” Philo argued that it was necessary to look beneath the surface meaning of Scripture to discern a deeper meaning which lay beneath the surface of the text. These ideas were taken up by a group of theologians based in Alexandria, of which the most important are generally agreed to be Clement (c.150–c.215), Origen (c.185–c.254), and Didymus the Blind (c.313–98). (Indeed, Jerome playfully referred to the last mentioned as “Didymus the Sighted” on account of the spiritual insights that resulted from his application of the allegorical method of biblical interpretation.)

It might at first sight seem that this means that the interpreter simply reads any meaning he or she likes into the text of Scripture. However, as the writings of Didymus (which were rediscovered, incidentally, in an ammunition dump in Egypt during the Second World War) make clear, this need not be the case. It seems that a consensus developed within the church about how the images and texts of the Old Testament were to be interpreted allegorically. For example, Jerusalem regularly came to be seen as an allegory of the church.

In contrast, the Antiochene school placed an emphasis upon the interpretation of Scripture in the light of its historical context. This school, especially associated with writers such as Diodore of Tarsus (died c.390), John Chrysostom (c.347–407), and Theodore of Mopsuestia (c.350–428), gave an emphasis to the historical location of Old Testament prophecies, which is quite absent from the writings of Origen and other representatives of the Alexandrian tradition. Thus Theodore, in dealing with Old Testament prophecy, stresses that the prophetic message was relevant to those to whom it was directly addressed, as well as having a developed meaning for a Christian readership. Every prophetic oracle is to be interpreted as having a single consistent historical or literal meaning. In consequence, Theodore tended to interpret relatively few Old Testament passages as referring directly to Christ, whereas the Alexandrian school regarded Christ as the hidden content of many Old Testament passages, both prophetic and historical.

In the western church, a slightly different approach emerged. Ambrose of Milan (c.337–97) developed a threefold understanding of the senses of Scripture, particularly the Old Testament: in addition to the natural sense, the interpreter may discern a moral sense and a rational or theological sense. Augustine chose to follow this approach, but instead argued for a twofold sense: a literal–fleshly–historical sense and an allegorical–mystical–spiritual sense, although he allowed that some passages could possess both senses. “The sayings of the prophets are found to have a threefold meaning, in that some have in mind the earthly Jerusalem, others the heavenly city, and others refer to both.” To understand the Old Testament at a purely historical level was unacceptable; the key to its understanding lay in its correct interpretation, through being seen in the right way.

It is not the Old Testament itself that is abolished in Christ but the concealing veil, so that it may be understood through Christ. That which is obscure and hidden without Christ is, as it were, opened up. [... Paul] does not say: “The Law or the Old Testament is abolished.” It is not the case, therefore, that by the grace of the Lord that which was covered has been abolished as useless; rather, the covering which concealed useful truth has been removed. [...] The secret truths are conveyed in figures that are to be brought to light by interpretation.

This hermeneutical approach allowed Augustine to stress the unity of the Old and New Testaments. Christ “rends the veil” that conceals the true meaning of the Old Testament, allowing the reader to realize that both testaments bear witness to the same faith, even if their modes of expression may be different. Augustine expresses this idea in a famous maxim: “The New Testament lies hidden in the Old, and the Old Testament is unveiled in the New.”

This distinction between the literal or historical sense of Scripture, on the one hand, and a deeper spiritual or allegorical meaning, on the other, came to be generally accepted within the church during the early Middle Ages. The standard method of biblical interpretation used during the Middle Ages is usually known as the Quadriga, or the “fourfold sense of Scripture.” The Latin term Quadriga originally meant a chariot drawn by four horses; in Christian usage, it came to mean the reader of Scripture being guided by the four meanings of the text. The origins of this method lie specifically in the distinction between the literal and spiritual senses. Scripture possesses four different senses. In addition to the literal sense, three nonliteral senses could be distinguished: the allegorical, defining what Christians are to believe; the tropological or moral, defining what Christians are to do; and the anagogical, defining what Christians are to hope for. The four senses of Scripture were thus the following:

1. the literal sense of Scripture, in which the text was taken at face value;
2. the allegorical sense, which interpreted certain otherwise obscure passages of Scripture to produce statements of doctrine;
3. the tropological or moral sense, which interpreted such passages to produce ethical guidance for Christian conduct;
4. the anagogical sense, which interpreted passages to indicate the grounds of Christian hope, pointing toward the future fulfillment of the divine promises in the New Jerusalem.

An excellent example of allegorical interpretation can be found in Bernard of Clairvaux's (1090–1153) twelfth-century exposition of the Song of Songs. Bernard here provides an allegorical interpretation of the phrase “the beams of our houses are of cedar, and our panels are of cypress” (Song of Solomon 1: 17), illustrating the way in which doctrinal or spiritual meaning was “read into” otherwise unpromising passages at this time:

By “houses” we are to understand the great mass of the Christian people, who are bound together with those who possess power and dignity, rulers of the church and the state, as “beams.” These hold them together by wise and firm laws; otherwise, if each of them were to operate in any way that they pleased, the walls would bend and collapse, and the whole house would fall in ruins. By the “panels” which are firmly attached to the beams and which adorn the house in a royal manner, we are to understand the kindly and ordered lives of a properly instructed clergy, and the proper administration of the rites of the church.

But surely this simply opened the way to an arbitrary interpretation of biblical passages, in which readers imposed their own views upon the text? This potential difficulty was avoided by insisting that nothing should be believed on the basis of a nonliteral sense of Scripture unless it could first be established on the basis of the literal sense. This insistence on the priority of the literal sense of Scripture may be seen as an implied criticism of the allegorical approach adopted by Origen, which virtually allowed interpreters of Scripture to read into any passage whatever “spiritual” interpretations they liked. Martin Luther stated this principle in the following way in 1515: “In the Scriptures no allegory, tropology, or anagogy is valid, unless that same truth is explicitly stated literally somewhere else. Otherwise, Scripture would become a laughing matter.”

The Quadrigena was a major component of academic study of the Bible within scholastic theological faculties of universities. But it was not the only option available to biblical interpreters in the first two decades of the sixteenth century. The only Protestant reformer to make significant use of this scholastic approach to biblical interpretation was Martin Luther, who deployed it in his early lectures on biblical works such as the Psalter. By far the most influential approach to the subject within reforming and humanist circles in the early Reformation period was that associated with Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536), to which we now turn.

Erasmus's Handbook of the Christian Soldier (1503; see p. 33) made much of the distinction between the “letter” and the “spirit” – that is, between the outward words of Scripture and their inner, real meaning. Especially in the Old Testament, the words of the text are like a shell, containing – but not identical with – the kernel of the meaning. The surface meaning of the text often conceals a deeper hidden meaning, which it is the task of the enlightened and responsible exegete to uncover. Biblical interpretation, according to Erasmus, is concerned with establishing the underlying sense, not the letter, of Scripture. There are strong affinities here with the Alexandrian school, noted earlier.

However, in his later writings, Erasmus emphasized the importance of establishing an accurate text using the best historical tools, and ensuring that biblical interpretation remained wedded as closely as possible to the text. It is possible that Erasmus became aware of the importance of accurately establishing the best text of the New Testament, and providing a reliable translation, when he produced the first printed version of the Greek New Testament in 1516.

A similar approach is found in the Protestant reformer Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531). Echoing Erasmus, Zwingli argued that the interpreter of the Bible is required to establish the “natural sense of Scripture,” which is not necessarily identical with the literal sense of Scripture. Zwingli’s humanist background allowed him to distinguish various figures of speech in the biblical text. A good example is found in the biblical narrative of the Last Supper, in which Jesus of Nazareth, when breaking the bread, spoke the words “this is my body” (Matthew 26: 26). The literal sense of these words would be “this piece of bread is my body,” but the natural sense is “this piece of bread signifies my body” (see p. 400). For Zwingli, this is the correct interpretation of this passage.

Zwingli’s search for the deeper meaning of Scripture (to be contrasted with the superficial meaning) is well illustrated by the story of Abraham and his son Isaac (Genesis 22). In this story, Abraham is represented as being willing to sacrifice Isaac if that is what God wants. The historical details of the story are too easily assumed to be its real meaning. In fact, Zwingli argues, the real meaning of that story can only be understood when it is seen as a prophetic anticipation of the story of Christ, in which Abraham represents God and Isaac is a figure (or, more technically, a “type”) of Christ.

With the advent of the modern period, the science of biblical interpretation has become considerably more complex, reflecting the increased acceptance within academic circles of new rational methods of interpretation, grounded in the assumptions of the Enlightenment. It is impossible to survey these developments adequately in the scope of this work. However, it will be helpful to note some broad tendencies in biblical interpretation during the past two and a half centuries. Under the influence of the Enlightenment, four main approaches can be seen in academic biblical interpretation.

1. The rational approach, found in the writings of Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768). This regards both Old and New Testaments as resting on a series of supernatural fictions. By a process of radical logical criticism, Reimarus argued that the supernatural elements of the Bible could not be taken seriously. It was therefore necessary to interpret Scripture along rational lines, as stating (although in a somewhat muddled manner) the universal truths of the religion of reason. With the general collapse in confidence in both the universality and the theological competence of reason in more recent times, the attractions of this approach have dwindled drastically.
2. The historical approach, which treats Scripture as an account of Christian origins. F. C. Baur (1792–1860), probably the most distinguished early representative of this tradition, argued that it was no longer permissible to explain the origins of the Christian faith in terms of “the only-begotten Son of God descending from the eternal throne of the Godhead to earth, and becoming a human person in the womb of the virgin.” Instead, Baur argued that it was possible to account for the origins of Christianity in rational and nonsupernatural terms. Believing that Hegelianism held the key to explaining how Christianity came into being, Baur made a direct appeal to its philosophy of history as an alternative explanation to the traditional accounts of the origins of Christian faith, and interpreted the New Testament in its light. With the waning of Hegelianism, Baur's impact also diminished.
3. The sociological approach. By the 1890s, many liberal Christians had lost interest in matters of Christian doctrine or theology and had begun to explore the wider category of “religion” in general – a trend which undergirds the development of faculties of “religious studies” in many western universities. Yet religion is a social phenomenon: concerned with far more than “ideas” as such, it comes under the category of “social history.” The way was thus opened for a sociological approach to biblical interpretation, which treated Christianity as a specific example of a general phenomenon – religion. An example of this approach is provided by Sir James Frazer's (1854–1941) The Golden Bough (1890–1915), which applied comparative ethnology (the study of peoples and their traditions) to the Bible on an unprecedented scale.

4. The literary approach, which is concerned to do justice to the distinctive literary categories of Scripture. One such approach which has had a major impact of late is narrative theology, discussed earlier in this chapter (see pp. 113–15).

Two other recent approaches to biblical interpretation should also be noted. The first is the distinctive hermeneutic of praxis of Latin American liberation theology (pp. 74–5). This emphasizes the solidarity experienced by the poor in reading the Bible. Thus, Leonardo Boff (born 1938) argues that “hermeneutical mediation” takes place between the reader and the text: the poor find themselves able to relate to Scripture because of the resonance between the situations described in the text and those experienced in life. As Boff puts it: “The liberation theologian goes to the scriptures bearing the whole weight of the problems, sorrows, and hopes of the poor, seeking light and inspiration from the divine word.”

Liberation theology thus argues that the task of the interpreter of Scripture is not theoretical but practical – namely, the mediation of liberation. As Boff argues, “liberative hermeneutics seeks to discover and activate the transforming energy of biblical texts.” Christianity is a praxis of liberation, leading to an interpretation of the Bible in the categories of politico-social liberation praxis rather than purely theoretical ideas, or a personalized individual piety.

The second approach is that adopted by postmodern theologians, who are suspicious of the notion of there being any meaning intrinsic to a text and of the notion that a text is capable of conveying the meaning intended by its author. Both the “New Criticism” in the 1940s and the “structuralism” of the 1960s attempted to find a principle for establishing meaning based on the text alone, considered as something quite distinct from its author. The “reader-response” school of biblical interpretation holds that active readers give texts their meaning. The meaning of a text does not lie in the author's intended message but in the thoughts and feelings of readers as they encounter the text. Meaning is thus something constructed by the reader, rather than being embedded within the text itself.

It must be appreciated, however, that there are considerable variations within this approach. Some theorists – such as Stanley Fish (born 1938) – tend toward the view that meaning is created by the reader alone. The reader thus controls the text, in that “the text and all its features are only defined and therefore brought into existence by the reader's interpretive strategies.”

Others, however, recognize the importance of a critical interaction between reader and text. Paul Ricoeur (1913–2005) describes reading as “the process by which the world of the text intersects with the world of the reader.” While the text may offer a generous range of possible interpretations, this range is nevertheless limited by the text itself. “A text is a finite space of interpretation: there is not just one interpretation, but, on the other hand, there is not an infinite number of them.”

Theories of the Inspiration of Scripture

The notion that the special status of Scripture within Christian theology rests upon its divine origins, however vaguely this may be stated, can be discerned both in the New Testament itself and in subsequent reflection on it. An important element in any discussion of the manner in which Scripture is inspired, and the significance which is to be attached to this, is 2 Timothy 3: 16–17, which speaks of Scripture as being “God-breathed” (theopneustos). This idea was common in early Christian thought, and was not regarded as controversial. The Greek-speaking Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria regarded Scripture as fully inspired, and argued that God used the authors of scriptural books as passive instruments for communicating the divine will.

The issue began to surface as potentially controversial at the time of the Reformation. The reasons for this can be seen from the writings of John Calvin. Calvin was concerned to defend the authority of Scripture against two groups of people. On the one hand were those on the more Catholic wing of the church, who argued that the authority of Scripture rested in its being recognized as authoritative by the church. On the other were the more radical evangelical writers, such as some Anabaptists, who argued that every individual had the right to ignore Scripture altogether in favor of some direct personal divine revelation. Calvin declared that the Spirit worked through Scripture (not bypassing it, as the radicals held) and that the Spirit lent direct authority to Scripture by inspiring it, thus doing away with the need for any external support to its authority (such as that of the church).

This point is important as it indicates that the reformers did not see the issue of inspiration as linked with the absolute historical reliability or factual inerrancy of the biblical texts. Calvin's doctrine of accommodation (p. 169) implied that God chose to be revealed in forms tailored to the abilities of the communities which were to receive this revelation. Thus in the case of Genesis 1, Calvin suggests that a whole series of ideas – such as the “days of creation” – are simply accommodated ways of speaking, a kind of divine “baby talk.” The idea of “biblical infallibility” or “inerrancy” was a later development within Protestantism, and can be traced to the United States in the middle of the nineteenth century.

The general Christian consensus on the inspiration and authority of Scripture can be studied from a number of major confessional documents, both Protestant and Catholic. For example, the definitive 1994 Catechism of the Catholic Church clearly grounds the authority of Scripture in its divine inspiration:

God is the author of Sacred Scripture. The divine revealed realities, which are contained and presented in the text of Sacred Scripture, have been written down under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. For Holy Mother Church, relying on the faith of the apostolic age, accepts as sacred and canonical the books of the Old and the New Testaments, whole and entire, with all their parts, on the grounds that, written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they have God as their author and have been handed on as such to the Church herself. God inspired the human authors of the sacred books.

With the coming of the Enlightenment, the idea of the Bible having any special status was called into question, largely on account of the presuppositions of the rationalism of the period and increased interest in the critical study of Scripture. A number of approaches to the issue of inspiration which developed around this period are of interest.

First, Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803), reflecting leading ideas of both secularism and Romanticism, argued that the idea of inspiration was to be interpreted in an artistic or aesthetic sense. In his Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (1782–3), Herder suggested that the most appropriate model for biblical inspiration was provided by works of art. Just as one might speak of a great novel, poem, or painting as “inspired,” so the same idea can be applied to Scripture. Inspiration is thus seen as a human achievement, rather than a gift of God.

We must read the Bible in a human way, since it is a book written by man for man: the language is human, it was written and preserved through human means, and the sense, in which one can understand it, the whole purpose, for which it may be used, is human.

Herder argues that, the more the “Word of God” is read in such a human way, the closer the human reader comes to the intention of God, its author, who created human beings to bear the divine image. Herder's argument that religious experience is mediated through poetry, music, and art leads to an emphasis upon the Bible as poetry, rather than the Bible as revelation. In effect, Herder sacralizes poetry, leading him to see the poetic character of Scripture as securing its sacred and inspired status.

Second, the Old Princeton school, represented by Charles Hodge (1797–1878) and Benjamin B. Warfield (1851–1921), developed strongly supernatural theories of inspiration, in conscious opposition to the naturalist approach favored by Herder. “Inspiration is that extraordinary, supernatural influence [...] exerted by the Holy Ghost on the writers of our Sacred Books, by which their words were rendered also the words of God, and, therefore, perfectly infallible.” Although Warfield is careful to stress that the humanity and individuality of biblical writers are not abolished by inspiration, he nonetheless insists that their humanity “was so dominated that their words became at the same time the words of God, and thus, in every case and all alike, absolutely infallible.”

Third, others held that inspiration was also to be regarded as God's guidance of the reader of Scripture, which enabled that reader to recognize the Word of God in the biblical text. As we have just seen, Warfield located the inspiration of Scripture in the biblical text itself, thus implying that Scripture was objectively, in itself, the Word of God for all who read it. Others argued for a subjective understanding of inspiration, by which the reader's perception of Scripture – rather than Scripture itself – was to be regarded as “inspired.” The Baptist theologian Augustus H. Strong (1836–1921) stressed that the authority of Scripture could not be located simply in the words of Scripture, as if these could have authoritative status apart from their reception by individual believers or the community of faith. Inspiration thus had to be recognized to have objective and subjective aspects.

Having examined some questions relating to Scripture as a source of Christian theology, we may now turn to a consideration of the role of tradition.

Tradition

The word “tradition” comes from the Latin term traditio, which means “handing over,” “handing down,” or “handing on.” According to the French Dominican theologian Yves Congar (1904–95), the technical term “tradition” was originally used in Roman legal documents, where it signified the transfer of property from a donor to a beneficiary. When the term began to be used by Christian theologians, it came to mean a “handing over” of something precious and important – the “deposit of faith,” or the gospel itself.

The idea of tradition is found in the New Testament. Paul, for example, informs his readers that he is handing on to them those core teachings of the Christian faith that he has himself received from other people (1 Corinthians 15: 1–4). The term can refer both to the action of passing teachings on to others – something that Paul insists must be done within the church – and to the body of teachings passed on in this manner. Tradition can thus be understood as a process of transmission as well as a body of teaching. The pastoral epistles (three later New Testament letters that are particularly concerned with questions of church structure and the passing on of Christian teaching: 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, and Titus) in particular stress the importance of “guarding the good deposit which was entrusted to you” (2 Timothy 1: 14).

If any controversy served to emphasize the importance of tradition, it was the Gnostic debates of the second century. Faced with repeated assertions from his Gnostic critics that he had misrepresented the Bible, Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202) argued that they had simply chosen to interpret the Bible according to their own taste. What had been handed down within the church, and within the church alone, was not merely the biblical texts but a certain way of reading and understanding those texts.

Everyone who wishes to perceive the truth should consider the apostolic tradition, which has been made known in every church in the entire world. We are able to number those who are bishops appointed by the apostles, and their successors in the churches to the present day, who taught and knew nothing of such things as these people imagine.

Irenaeus's point is that a continuous stream of Christian teaching, life, and interpretation can be traced from the time of the apostles to his own period. The church is able to point to those who have maintained its specific way of reading and interpreting the Bible, and to certain public standard creeds which set out the main lines of Christian belief. This, he argues, contrasts with the secret and mystical teaching of the Gnostics, which is not available for public inspection and which cannot be traced back to the apostles themselves. Tradition is thus the guarantor of faithfulness to the original apostolic teaching, a safeguard against the innovations and misrepresentations of biblical texts on the part of the Gnostics.

This point was further developed in the early fifth century by Vincent of Lérins (died c.445), who was concerned that certain doctrinal innovations were being introduced without adequate reason. Vincent was especially troubled by some of Augustine's views on predestination, which he regarded as unwise and hasty improvisations. There was a need to have public standards by which such doctrines could be judged. So what standard was available by which the church could be safeguarded from such errors? For Vincent, the answer was clear – tradition:

On account of the number and variety of errors, there is a need for someone to lay down a rule for the interpretation of the prophets and the apostles in such a way that is directed by the rule of the catholic church. Now in the catholic church itself the greatest care is taken that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all people. This is what is truly and properly catholic. This is clear from the force of the word and reason, which understands everything universally. We shall follow “universality” in this way, if we acknowledge this one faith to be true, which the entire church confesses throughout the world. We affirm “antiquity” if we in no way depart from those understandings which it is clear that the greater saints and our fathers proclaimed. And we follow “consensus” if in this antiquity we follow all (or certainly nearly all) the definitions of the bishops and masters.

This threefold criterion – universality, antiquity, and consensus – has come to be known as the “Vincentian canon,” and has been of considerable importance in ecumenical discussions in recent years.

Yet this approach to tradition was vulnerable at certain points. For example, it seemed to suggest that “tradition” was a purely static notion – the views of the past, which the present was bound to repeat. Concern over this view became apparent within some Catholic circles during the nineteenth century. Of particular interest are the views of Johann Adam Möhler (1796–1838; also spelled “Moehler”), the founder of the Catholic Tübingen school. In his much-read Symbolism, published in 1832, Möhler set out an understanding of tradition as a living voice within the church, by which the Christian community's interpretation of Scripture is safeguarded from error:

Tradition is the living Word, perpetuated in the hearts of believers. To this sense, as the general sense, the interpretation of Holy Writ is entrusted. The declaration, which it pronounces on any controverted subject, is the judgment of the Church; and, therefore, the Church is judge in matters of faith. Tradition, in the objective sense, is the general faith of the Church through all ages, manifested by outward historical testimonies; in this sense, tradition is usually termed the norm, the standard of Scriptural interpretation – the rule of faith.

It will be clear that Möhler understands tradition to have both subjective and objective aspects. The objective sense corresponds roughly to Vincent's notion of doctrinal consensus – that is, to “the general faith of the Church through all ages, manifested by outward historical testimonies.” Yet the subjective element prevents this from becoming a mere process of ecclesiastical fossilization. Tradition is something living and dynamic.

This issue remains important. In the twentieth century, a concerted effort was made within both the Catholic and Orthodox churches to distinguish “tradition” from “traditionalism.” The latter is understood as a slavish and wooden adherence to the doctrinal or moral formulations of the past, whereas the former is understood as the living faithfulness of the church to the faith which it expresses. This approach may be discerned within the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1994), which draws attention to the close connection between Scripture and tradition:

In keeping with the Lord's command, the Gospel was handed on in two ways:

- orally, by the apostles who handed on, by the spoken word of their preaching, by the example they gave, by the institutions they established, what they themselves had received – whether from the lips of Christ, from his way of life and his works, or whether they had learned it at the prompting of the Holy Spirit.
- in writing, by those apostles and other men associated with the apostles who, under the inspiration of the same Holy Spirit, committed the message of salvation to writing.

In order that the full and living Gospel might always be preserved in the Church, the apostles left bishops as their successors. They gave them their own position of teaching authority. Indeed, the apostolic teaching, which is expressed in a special way in the inspired books, was to be preserved in a continuous line of succession until the end of time. This living transmission, accomplished in the Holy Spirit, is called Tradition, since it is distinct from Sacred Scripture, though closely connected to it. Through Tradition, the Church, in her doctrine, life, and worship perpetuates and transmits to every generation all that she herself is, all that she believes. [...]

The Father's self-communication made through his Word in the Holy Spirit remains present and active in the Church.

Note the emphasis that is placed here upon the role of the church as a living organism, which passes down the content of the faith, based in Scripture, to each generation. “Tradition” is thus understood as a living and active process of passing on the Christian faith, rather than as a static source of revelation, independent of Scripture. It is “the living river that unites us to our origins” (Pope Benedict XVI).

A similar emphasis can be found in the writings of leading Orthodox theologians, such as John Meyendorff (1926–92). In his influential work Living Tradition (1978), Meyendorff stressed that tradition is not to be understood as an accumulated body of propositional truths, which simply repeats the insights of the past:

True tradition is always a living tradition. It changes while remaining always the same. It changes because it faces different situations, not because its essential content is modified. This content is not an abstract proposition; it is the living Christ Himself, who said, “I am the Truth.”

It will thus be clear that the word “tradition” implies not merely something that is handed down but an active process of reflection by which theological or spiritual insights are valued, assessed, and transmitted from one generation to another. Three broad approaches to tradition may be detected within Christian theology and will be considered in what follows.

A Single-Source Theory of Tradition

In response to various controversies within the early church, especially the threat from Gnosticism, a “traditional” method of understanding certain passages of Scripture began to develop. Second-century patristic theologians such as Irenaeus of Lyons began to develop the idea of an authorized way of interpreting certain texts of Scripture which he argued went back to the time of the apostles themselves. Scripture could not be allowed to be interpreted in any arbitrary or self-serving way: it had to be interpreted within the context of the historical continuity of the Christian church. The parameters of its interpretation were historically fixed and “given.” “Tradition” here means simply “a traditional way of interpreting Scripture within the community of faith.” This is a single-source theory of theology: theology is based upon Scripture, and “tradition” refers to a “traditional way of interpreting Scripture.”

The mainstream Reformation adopted this approach, insisting that traditional interpretations of Scripture – such as the doctrine of the Trinity or the practice of infant baptism – could be retained, provided they could be shown to be consistent with Scripture. On the basis of this observation, it will be clear that it is incorrect to suggest that the magisterial reformers elevated private judgment above the corporate judgment of the church, or that they descended into some form of individualism. This is, however, unquestionably true of the radical Reformation (see below).

A Dual-Source Theory of Tradition

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, there developed a somewhat different understanding of tradition from that noted above. “Tradition” was understood to be a separate and distinct source of revelation, in addition to Scripture. Scripture, it was argued, was silent on a number of points, but God had providentially arranged for a second source of revelation to supplement this deficiency: a stream of unwritten tradition, going back to the apostles themselves. This tradition was passed down from one generation to another within the church. This is a dual-source theory of tradition: tradition is based upon two quite distinct sources, Scripture and unwritten tradition.

A belief which is not to be found explicitly stated in Scripture may thus, on the basis of this dual-source theory, be justified by an appeal to an unwritten tradition. This position was defended strongly at the Council of Trent, which was charged with stating and defending the Catholic position against the threat posed by the Reformation. Trent ruled that Scripture could not be regarded as the only source of revelation. The Council therefore argued that Scripture and tradition alike were to be regarded as inspired by the same Holy Spirit, and safeguarded and handed down by the same Catholic church:

This truth and discipline are contained in the written books, and the unwritten traditions which, received by the apostles from the mouth of Christ himself, or from the apostles themselves, the Holy Spirit dictating, have come down to us, transmitted as it were from hand to hand; following the examples of the orthodox Fathers, [the church] receives and venerates with an equal affection of piety, and reverence, all the books both of the Old and of the New Testament – seeing that the one God is the author of both – as also the said traditions, whether these relate to faith or to morals, as having been dictated, either by Christ's own word of mouth, or by the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the Catholic Church by a continuous succession.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–5) subtly modified this approach, understanding “tradition” as a “traditional interpretation of Scripture,” discussed earlier. It also noted that there is a “growth in the understanding of the realities and the words which have been handed down” as a result of reflection, as “the Church constantly moves forward toward the fullness of divine truth until the words of God reach their complete fulfillment in her.”

The two approaches just discussed affirm the value of tradition. A third approach, which in effect rejects tradition, came to be influential within the radical wing of the Reformation, often known as “Anabaptism,” and subsequently was developed by writers sympathetic to the Enlightenment.

The Total Rejection of Tradition

For certain radical theologians of the sixteenth century, such as Thomas Müntzer (1489–1525) and Caspar Schwenkfeld (1490–1561), every individual had the right to interpret Scripture as he or she pleased, subject to the guidance of the Holy Spirit. For the radical Sebastian Franck (1499–1543), the Bible “is a book sealed with seven seals which none can open unless he has the key of David, which is the illumination of the Spirit.” The way was thus opened for individualism, with the private judgment of the individual raised above the corporate judgment of the church. Thus, the radicals rejected the practice of infant baptism (to which the magisterial Reformation remained committed) as unbiblical. (There is no explicit reference to the practice in the New Testament.)

Similarly, doctrines such as the Trinity and the divinity of Christ were rejected as resting upon inadequate scriptural foundations. The radicals had no place whatsoever for tradition. As Sebastian Franck wrote in 1530: "Foolish Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory, of whom not one even knew the Lord, so help me God, nor was sent by God to teach. Rather, they were all apostles of Antichrist."

This approach was developed further during the Enlightenment, which was anxious to liberate itself from the shackles of tradition. Political emancipation from the oppression of the past (a key theme of the French Revolution) meant a total abandoning of the political, social, and religious ideas of the past. One of the reasons why Enlightenment thinkers placed such a high value upon human reason was that it relieved them of the need to appeal to tradition for ideas; any ideas worth knowing about were accessible to reason alone.

A respect for tradition was thus seen as capitulation to the authority of the past, a self-imposed bondage to outdated social, political, and religious structures. "Modern thought was born in a crisis of authority, took shape in flight from authority, and aspired from the start to autonomy from all traditional influence whatsoever" (Jeffrey Stout). Or, as the philosopher of science Michael Polanyi (1891–1976) put it:

We were warned that a host of unproven beliefs were instilled in us from earliest childhood. That religious dogma, the authority of the ancients, the teaching of the schools, the maxims of the nursery, all were united to a body of tradition which we tended to accept merely because these beliefs had been previously held by others, who wanted us to embrace them in our turn.

The Enlightenment thus represented a radical rejection of tradition. Reason required no supplementation by voices from the past. The waning of the influence of the Enlightenment in recent decades has been an important factor in encouraging the emergence of a new interest in and respect for tradition in Christian theology.

Theology and Worship: The Importance of Liturgical Tradition

One of the most important elements of the Christian tradition is fixed forms of worship, usually known as “liturgy.” In recent years, there has been a rediscovery of the fact that Christian theologians pray and worship, and that this devotional context shapes their theological reflections. This point has been appreciated since the first centuries of the Christian church. The Latin tag lex orandi, lex credendi, which could be translated roughly as “the way you pray determines what you believe,” expresses the fact that theology and worship interact with each other. What Christians believe affects the manner in which they pray and worship; the manner in which Christians pray and worship affects what they believe.

Two controversies within the early church, centering on Gnosticism and Arianism, illustrate the importance of this point particularly well. On the basis of their radical dualism between the “physical” and the “spiritual,” the Gnostics argued that matter was inherently evil. In refuting this position, Irenaeus pointed to the fact that bread, wine, and water were used in the Christian sacraments. How could these materials be evil, if they were given so prominent a position in Christian worship?

Arius (c.260–c.336) argued that Christ was supreme among God's creatures. His opponents, such as Athanasius (c.293–373), retorted that this Christology was totally inconsistent with the way in which Christians worshiped. Athanasius stressed the theological importance of the practice of praying to Christ and worshiping him. If Arius was right, Christians were guilty of idolatry, through worshiping a creature, rather than God. Where Arius believed that theology should criticize liturgy, Athanasius believed that worship patterns and practices had to be taken into account by theologians.

In recent times, there has been renewed interest in the relationship between liturgy and theology. In his Doxology (1980), the Methodist writer Geoffrey Wainwright (born 1939) drew attention to the way in which theological motifs were incorporated into Christian worship from the earliest of times. The liturgy of the church includes intellectual elements and is not purely emotive in character. As a result, the close relationship between theology and liturgy, noted above, is entirely natural, in that worship and theological reflection are linked together organically.

In his On Liturgical Theology (1984), the Catholic theologian Aidan Kavanagh (1929–2006) argued that worship was the primary source and stimulus of Christian theology. Kavanagh drew a sharp distinction between “primary theology” (worship) and “secondary theology” (theological reflection). This suggests that worship has the upper hand over theology. But what happens if liturgical development becomes irresponsible? Does theology have a role in limiting or criticizing liturgy? This question of the relative authority of the lex orandi and lex credendi remains to be further explored, and is likely to be the subject of debate for some time to come.

Reason

The third major theological resource to be considered is human reason. Although the importance of reason for Christian theology has always been recognized, it assumed an especial importance at the time of the Enlightenment (see pp. 58–61). We open our discussion by considering the changing emphasis which has come to be placed upon reason within the Christian tradition.

Reason and Revelation: Three Models

As human beings are rational creatures, it is to be expected that reason should have a major role to play in theology. There has, however, been considerable debate within Christian theology concerning what that role might be. In our discussion of the development of patristic attitudes to secular culture, including philosophy (see pp. 99–102), we noted a variety of attitudes that developed at the time, including a rather uncritical acceptance of Platonism (e.g., Justin Martyr, c.100–c.165), a vigorous rejection of any role for philosophy in theology (e.g., Tertullian), and a willingness to appropriate at least some ideas from secular philosophy (e.g., Augustine). It will be helpful to survey attitudes since the patristic period, during which three broad categories of positions can be discerned.

Theology is a Rational Discipline

This position, associated with writers such as Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), works on the assumption that the Christian faith is fundamentally rational and can thus be both supported and explored by reason. Aquinas's “Five Ways,” considered in a later chapter (p. 158), illustrate his belief that reason is capable of lending support to the ideas of faith.

But Aquinas, and the Christian tradition which he represented, did not believe that Christianity was limited to what could be determined by reason. Faith goes beyond reason, having access to truths and insights of revelation which reason cannot hope to fathom or discover unaided. Reason has the role of building upon what is known by revelation, exploring what its implications might be. In this sense, theology is a scientia – a rational discipline, using rational methods to extend what is known by revelation. Etienne Gilson (1884–1978) likened Christianity to a cathedral which rests upon the bedrock of human reason but whose superstructure rises beyond the realms accessible to pure reason. It rests upon rational foundations, but the building erected on that foundation goes far beyond what reason can uncover. Philosophy is thus the ancilla theologiae, “the handmaid of theology” (see the more extended discussion at pp. 153–5).

Theology is the Republication of the Insights of Reason

By the middle of the seventeenth century, especially in England and Germany, a new attitude had begun to develop. Christianity, it was argued, was reasonable. Where Thomas Aquinas understood this to mean that faith rested on rational foundations, the new school of thought held that every aspect of faith, every item of Christian belief, must be shown to derive from human reason. If faith is rational, it was argued, it must be capable of being deduced in its entirety by reason.

An excellent example of this approach is to be found in the writings of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1583–1648), especially On the Truth of Religion (1624), which argued for a rational Christianity based upon the innate sense of God and human moral obligation. This had two major consequences. First, Christianity was in effect reduced to those ideas that could be proved by reason. If Christianity was rational, any parts of its system which could not be proved by reason could not be counted as “rational.” They would have to be discarded. And, second, reason was understood to take priority over revelation. Reason comes first, revelation comes second.

Reason thus came to be regarded as being capable of establishing what is right without needing any assistance from revelation. Christianity has to follow reason, being accepted where it endorses what reason has to say and being disregarded where it goes its own way. So why bother with the idea of revelation, when reason could tell us all we could possibly wish to know about God, the world, and ourselves? This absolutely settled conviction in the total competence of human reason underlies the rationalist depreciation of the Christian doctrine of revelation in Jesus Christ and through Scripture.

Theology is Redundant; Reason Reigns Supreme

Finally, this potentially rationalist position was pushed to its logical outcome. As a matter of fact, it was argued, Christianity does include a series of major beliefs which are inconsistent with reason. Reason has the right to judge religion because it stands above it. This approach is associated with Deism, an English movement which laid the foundations of this form of rationalism in religion. The term “Deism” (from the Latin deus, “god”) is often used in a general sense to refer to the view of God that maintains God's creatorship, but denies a continuing divine involvement with, or special presence within, that creation. It is often contrasted with “theism” (from the Greek theos, “god”), which allows for continuing divine involvement within the world.

A good example of Deism is Christianity as Old as Creation (1730), by Matthew Tindal (1657–1733), which famously declared that Christianity was nothing other than the “republication of the religion of nature.” God is understood as the extension of accepted human ideas of justice, rationality, and wisdom. This universal religion is available at all times and in every place, whereas traditional Christianity rested upon the idea of a divine revelation which was not accessible to those who lived before Christ. Tindal's views were propagated before the modern discipline of the sociology of knowledge created skepticism regarding the idea of “universal reason,” and are an excellent model of the rationalism characteristic of the movement, which later became influential within the Enlightenment.

The ideas of English Deism percolated throughout the continent of Europe (especially to Germany) through translations and through the writings of individuals familiar with and sympathetic to them, such as Voltaire's (1694–1778) Philosophical Letters (1733). Enlightenment rationalism, to which we now turn to consider in greater detail, is often considered to be the final flowering of the bud of English Deism.

Enlightenment Rationalism

The basic presupposition of Enlightenment rationalism is that human reason is perfectly capable of telling us everything we need to know about the world, ourselves, and God (if there is one). One of the most graphic portrayals of this enormous confidence in reason is the frontispiece to the eighteenth-century rationalist philosopher Christian Wolff's (1679–1754) ambitiously titled book Reasonable Thoughts about God, the World, the Human Soul, and just about Everything Else (1720). The engraving in question portrays a world enveloped in shadows and gloom, representing the old ideas of superstition, tradition, and faith. But, on part of the engraving, the sun has broken through, lighting up hills and valleys and bringing smiles to the faces of what we must assume to have been a hitherto rather gloomy group of peasants. The message is clear: reason enlightens, dispelling the fog and darkness of Christian faith and ushering in the glorious light of human rationality. Divine revelation is an irrelevance, if it exists at all. The consequences of this approach were noted in more detail earlier, when we surveyed the general impact of the Enlightenment upon Christian theology (p. 59).

At this point, we need to stress the difference between “reason” and “rationalism,” which may appear identical to some readers. Reason is the basic human faculty of thinking, based on argument and evidence. It is theologically neutral and poses no threat to faith – unless it is regarded as the only source of knowledge about God. It then becomes rationalism, which is an exclusive reliance upon human reason alone and a refusal to allow any weight to be given to divine revelation.

Enlightenment rationalism may be said to rest upon the belief that unaided human reason can deliver everything that humanity needs to know. There is no need to listen to other voices, having first consulted reason. By definition, the Christian cannot have anything to say that is at one and the same time distinctive and right. If it is distinctive, it departs from the path of reason – and thus must be untrue. To be different is, quite simply, to be wrong.

An excellent example of this rationalist critique of Christianity can be seen in relation to the doctrine of Christ (how could Jesus be both God and man at one and the same time?) and the doctrine of the Trinity (how can one God be three persons simultaneously, without lapsing into crude logical contradiction?). One of the early American presidents, Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826), who was deeply influenced by eighteenth-century French rationalism, poured reasoned scorn upon such doctrines. Jesus, he argued, was really a very simple rational teacher, who taught a very simple and reasonable gospel about a very simple and rational idea of God. And at every point, Christianity chose to make things more complicated than they need be.

A direct consequence of this was the movement in New Testament studies known as the “quest for the historical Jesus” (see pp. 236–41). This quest, which dates from the late eighteenth century, was based upon the belief that the New Testament got Jesus entirely wrong. The real Jesus – the “Jesus of history” – was a simple Galilean teacher, who taught entirely sensible ideas based upon reason. The New Testament quite erroneously presented him as the risen savior of sinful humanity.

Reason was thus held to be able to judge Christ. In his celebrated work Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793), Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) argued powerfully for the priority of reason and conscience over the authority of Jesus Christ. Where Christ endorses what reason has to say, he is to be respected; where he goes against or goes beyond reason, he is to be rejected.

Enlightenment rationalism asserted the sovereignty of unaided human reason, arguing that human reason was capable of establishing all that it was necessary to know about religion without recourse to the idea of “revelation.” Furthermore, reason possessed an ability to judge the truths of religions, such as Christianity, and eliminate vast tracts of their ideas as “irrational.” Influential though such ideas were in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, they are now regarded with suspicion. The following section explores why.

Criticisms of Enlightenment Rationalism

A series of developments, of which we may here note a few, have severely eroded the credibility of the Enlightenment approach. Most writers sympathetic to the ideas of the Enlightenment made an appeal to Euclid's five principles of geometry. On the basis of his five principles, Euclid was able to construct an entire geometrical system, which seemed to be an example of a universal and necessarily true system based upon reason alone. Philosophers, such as Baruch Spinoza (1632–77), argued that the same method could be applied in philosophy. A secure edifice of philosophy and ethics could be erected on the basis of a secure and universal rational foundation, as in Euclid's geometry.

Yet the discovery of non-Euclidian geometry during the nineteenth century destroyed the appeal of this analogy. It turned out that there were other ways of doing geometry, each just as internally consistent as Euclid's. But which is right? The question cannot be answered. They are all different, each with its own special merits and problems.

Much the same observation is now made concerning rationalism itself. Whereas once it was argued that there was one single rational principle, it is increasingly conceded that there are – and always have been – many different “rationalities.” As explorers returned to Europe from voyages to Africa, Asia, and Australasia in the eighteenth century, they brought with them knowledge of cultures that adopted rationalities and cultural norms that bore little relation to those of western Europe. Did this not suggest that human reason was not as universal as the Enlightenment assumed? That there were local variations in patterns of rationality?

In his penetrating historical analysis of rationalist approaches to truth and meaning in Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (1988), the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre (born 1929) drew the conclusion that the Enlightenment seemed to demand criteria of justification that simply could not be met in practice:

Both the thinkers of the Enlightenment and their successors proved unable to agree as to precisely what those principles were which would be found undeniable by all rational persons. One kind of answer was given by the authors of the Encyclopédie, a second by Rousseau, a third by Bentham, a fourth by Kant, a fifth by the Scottish philosophers of common sense and their French and American disciples. Nor has subsequent history diminished the extent of such disagreement. Consequently, the legacy of the Enlightenment has been the provision of an ideal of rational justification which it has proved impossible to attain.

It is for such reasons that the philosopher Hans-Georg Gadamer (1900–2002) wrote scathingly of the “Robinson Crusoe dream of the historical Enlightenment, as artificial as Crusoe himself.” Gadamer himself was deeply concerned about the question of whether it was possible to transcend history and culture, in order to find a truly objective position from which to critique society and its ideas. The Enlightenment, in his view, failed to deliver on its promises. The notion of a “universal rationality” is today viewed by many as little more than a fiction. Postmodernism has argued that there exist a variety of “rationalities,” each of which has to be respected in its own right; there is no privileged vantage point, no universal concept of “reason,” which can pass judgment upon them.

Having considered some aspects of reason as a theological resource, we may now turn to consider the place of religious experience in theology.

Religious Experience

“Experience” is an imprecise term. The origins of the word are relatively well understood: it derives from the Latin term experientia, which could be interpreted as “that which arises out of traveling through life.” In this broad sense, it means “an accumulated body of knowledge, arising through first-hand encounter with life.” When one speaks of “an experienced teacher” or “an experienced doctor,” the implication is that they have learned their craft through first-hand application.

Yet the term has developed an acquired meaning which particularly concerns us here. It has come to refer to the inner life of individuals, in which those individuals become aware of their own subjective feelings and emotions. It relates to the inward and subjective world of experience, as opposed to the outward world of everyday life. An emphasis on the importance of religious experience was characteristic of early Methodism, and we noted earlier how “the Wesleyan quadrilateral” grouped together Scripture, tradition, reason, and experience. The first three elements of this quadrilateral reflect John Wesley's insistence that the task of interpreting the Bible was to be illuminated by the collective Christian wisdom of other ages and cultures between the apostolic age and our own, as well as being protected from obscurantism by means of the disciplines of critical reason. Most importantly, for Wesley, the message of Scripture must be received in the heart by a living faith which experiences God as present. The fourth element of the quadrilateral reflects this distinctive Wesleyan emphasis, characteristic of Pietism (see p. 45).

Wesley is not on his own in stressing the importance of experience. In his celebrated study The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), the Harvard psychologist William James (1842–1910) stressed the importance of the subjective aspects of religion in general, and Christianity in particular. In developing his account of religious experience, James drew extensively on a wide range of published works and personal testimonies, engaging with religious experience on its own terms and taking accounts of such experiences at face value. James identified four characteristics of such religious experience:

1. Ineffability. The experience “defies expression”; it cannot be described adequately in words. “Its quality must be directly experienced; it cannot be imparted or transferred to others.”
2. Noetic quality. Such an experience is seen to possess authority, giving insight and knowledge into deep truths, which are sustained over time. These “states of insight into depths of truth unplumbed by the discursive intellect” are understood to be “illuminations, revelations, full of significance and importance, all inarticulate though they remain.”
3. Transiency. “Mystical states cannot be sustained for long.” Usually, they last from a few seconds to minutes and their quality cannot be accurately remembered, though the experience is recognized if it recurs. “When faded, their quality can but imperfectly be reproduced in memory.”

4. 4 Passivity. “Although the oncoming of mystical states may be facilitated by preliminary voluntary operations,” once they have begun, the mystic feels out of control as if he or she “were grasped and held by a superior power.”

While James notes that the second and third characteristics are “less marked” than the others, he considers them to be integral to any phenomenology of religious experience.

James's research demonstrates that Christianity is not simply about ideas (as our discussion of Scripture, reason, and tradition might suggest); it is about the interpretation and transformation of the inner life of the individual.

In what follows, we shall consider the four main approaches to the question of the relationship between experience and theology that you are likely to encounter within Christian theology:

1. Experience provides a foundational resource for Christian theology.
2. Christian theology is able to relate to human experience and to the “ultimate questions” that arise from it.
3. Christian theology provides a framework by which human experience may be interpreted.
4. God is simply an objectification of human experience.

We shall consider each of these approaches in what follows.

Experience as the Basis of Christian Theology

The idea that human religious experience can act as a foundational resource for Christian theology has obvious attractions. It suggests that Christian theology is concerned with human experience – something which is common to all humanity, rather than the exclusive preserve of a small group. This approach is often seen as useful when responding to the “scandal of particularity” – the concern that the specific historical location of Jesus of Nazareth denies direct knowledge of him to other historical situations.

More recently, this approach has been welcomed by some interested in interreligious dialogue. It suggests that the world religions are basically human responses to the same religious experience – often referred to as “a core experience of the transcendent.” Theology is thus the Christian attempt to reflect upon this common human experience, in the knowledge that the same experience underlies the other world religions. We shall return to this point later in dealing with the question of the relation of Christianity to the other religions (pp. 416–24).

Theology Connects with Human Experience

The Protestant Paul Tillich (1886–1965) and the Catholic David Tracy (born 1939) both developed theories of the correlation of theology and common human experience. If humans share a common experience, whether they choose to regard it as “religious” or not, Christian theology is able to address that experience. The problem of agreeing upon a common starting point is thus avoided; the starting point is already provided, in human experience. This approach is probably seen at its best in Paul Tillich's volume of sermons The Courage to Be, which attracted considerable attention after its publication in 1952. Tillich here sets out to “correlate” the various analyses of the human predicament produced in modern culture with the “answers” provided by “the symbols used in the Christian message.”

But there are some difficulties here. The most obvious is that there is actually very little empirical evidence for a “common core experience” throughout human history and culture. The idea is easily postulated and virtually impossible to verify. This criticism has found its most mature and sophisticated expression in the “experiential–expressive theory of doctrine,” to use a term employed by the Yale theologian George Lindbeck. In The Nature of Doctrine (1984), Lindbeck provided an important analysis of the nature of Christian doctrine (see pp. 78–9), which was critical of those models that appeal to common human experience.

Theology as the Interpreter of Human Experience

This approach regards experience as something unfocused or ambiguous that needs to be interpreted using the framework provided by Christian theology. Theology aims to interpret experience. It is like a net which we can cast over experience, in order to capture its meaning. Experience is seen as something which is to be interpreted, rather than something which is capable of interpreting itself.

For example, the dialectic between the Christian doctrines of creation and sin can be deployed to provide an interpretation of a common human experience – an awareness of dissatisfaction, or a curious sense of longing for something undefined. To illustrate the relationship between theology and experience, we may consider Augustine's analysis of the implications for experience of the Christian doctrine of creation.

According to Augustine, our feeling of dissatisfaction is a consequence of the Christian doctrine of creation – that we are made in the image of God. There is thus an inbuilt capacity within human nature to relate to God. Yet, on account of the fallenness of human nature, this potential is frustrated. There is now a natural tendency to try to make other things fulfill this need. Created things thus come to be substituted for God. Yet they do not satisfy. Human beings are thus left with a feeling of longing – longing for something indefinable.

This phenomenon has been recognized since the dawn of human civilization. In his dialogue Gorgias, Plato compares human beings to leaky jars. Somehow, human beings are always unfulfilled. Perhaps the greatest statement of this feeling, and its most famous theological interpretation, may be found in the famous words of Augustine: “You have made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you.”

Throughout Augustine's reflections, especially in his autobiographical Confessions, the same theme recurs. Humanity is destined to remain incomplete in its present existence. Its hopes and deepest longings will remain nothing but hopes and longings. The themes of creation and redemption are brought together by Augustine, to provide an interpretation of the human experience of "longing." Because humanity is created in the image of God, it desires to relate to God, even if it cannot recognize that desire for what it is. Yet, on account of human sin, humanity cannot satisfy that desire unaided. And so a real sense of frustration, of dissatisfaction, develops. And that dissatisfaction – though not its theological interpretation – is part of common human experience. Augustine expresses this feeling when he states that he "is groaning with inexpressible groanings on my wanderer's path, and remembering Jerusalem with my heart lifted up toward it – Jerusalem my home land, Jerusalem my mother."

Augustine's approach was echoed by the twentieth-century Oxford literary critic and theologian C. S. Lewis. Like Augustine, Lewis was aware of certain deep human emotions which point to a dimension of our existence beyond time and space. There is, Lewis suggested, a deep and intense feeling of longing within human beings, which no earthly object or experience can satisfy. Lewis terms this sense "joy," and argues that it points to God as its source and goal (hence the title of his celebrated 1955 autobiography, Surprised by Joy). Joy, according to Lewis, is "an unsatisfied desire which is itself more desirable than any other satisfaction [...] anyone who has experienced it will want it again."

Lewis addressed this question further in a sermon entitled "The Weight of Glory," preached at the University of Oxford on June 8, 1941. Lewis spoke of "a desire which no natural happiness will satisfy," "a desire, still wandering and uncertain of its object and still largely unable to see that object in the direction where it really lies." There is something self-defeating about human desire, in that what is desired, when achieved, seems to leave the desire unsatisfied. Lewis's basic point is thoroughly Augustinian: the creation creates a sense of longing for its creator, which it cannot satisfy by itself. In this way, an essentially Augustinian framework is applied to common human experience, to provide a plausible theological interpretation.

God as a Misinterpretation of Human Experience

As noted above, many theologians have regarded experience-based theologies as providing an escape from the impasse of Enlightenment rationalism, or from difficulties relating to the alleged particularity of Christian revelation. F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) is an excellent example of a theologian who was concerned to use human experience as a starting point for Christian theology. In particular, Schleiermacher drew attention to the importance for theology of “a feeling of absolute dependence.” By exploring the nature and origins of this feeling, it was possible to trace it back to its origins in God.

However, the atheist German philosopher Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72) argued that any such approach was potentially problematic. Experience did not lead to God; God was simply an improper objectification of human experience. In the foreword to the first edition of his highly influential Essence of Christianity (1841), Feuerbach states that the “supernatural mysteries of religion are based upon quite simple natural truths.” Human beings, Feuerbach argues, have created the gods, who embody their own idealized conception of their aspirations, needs, and fears. Human “feeling” has nothing to do with God; it is of purely human origin, misunderstood by an overactive human imagination. A so-called “experience of God” is “nothing but self-intoxicated, self-contented feeling.” We experience ourselves, thinking we experience God.

Feuerbach's critique of religion loses much of its force when dealing with nontheistic religions, or theologies (such as that of Karl Barth) which claim to deal with a divine encounter with humanity from outside. However, it remains significant when applied to a theistic construction or interpretation of human emotional or psychological states. Has anyone really spoken about God or Christ? Or have we simply projected our longings and fears onto an imaginary transcendent plane, or onto a distant historical figure about whom we know very little? The growing conviction that Christology must be objectively grounded in the history of Jesus of Nazareth (especially prominent, for example, in the writings of Wolfhart Pannenberg, 1928–2014) is due at least in part to Feuerbach's critique of religion.

Karl Marx (1818–83) believed that Feuerbach had failed to explain the origins of such a fundamental category mistake. What motivated human beings to mistakenly interpret their feelings in terms of the existence of God? For Marx, the answer lay in their social and economic conditions. The interpretation of human experience in terms of the existence of God was a result of economic deprivation; if this social context were changed – for example, through a socialist revolution – there would no longer be any reason to interpret experience in this mistaken manner.

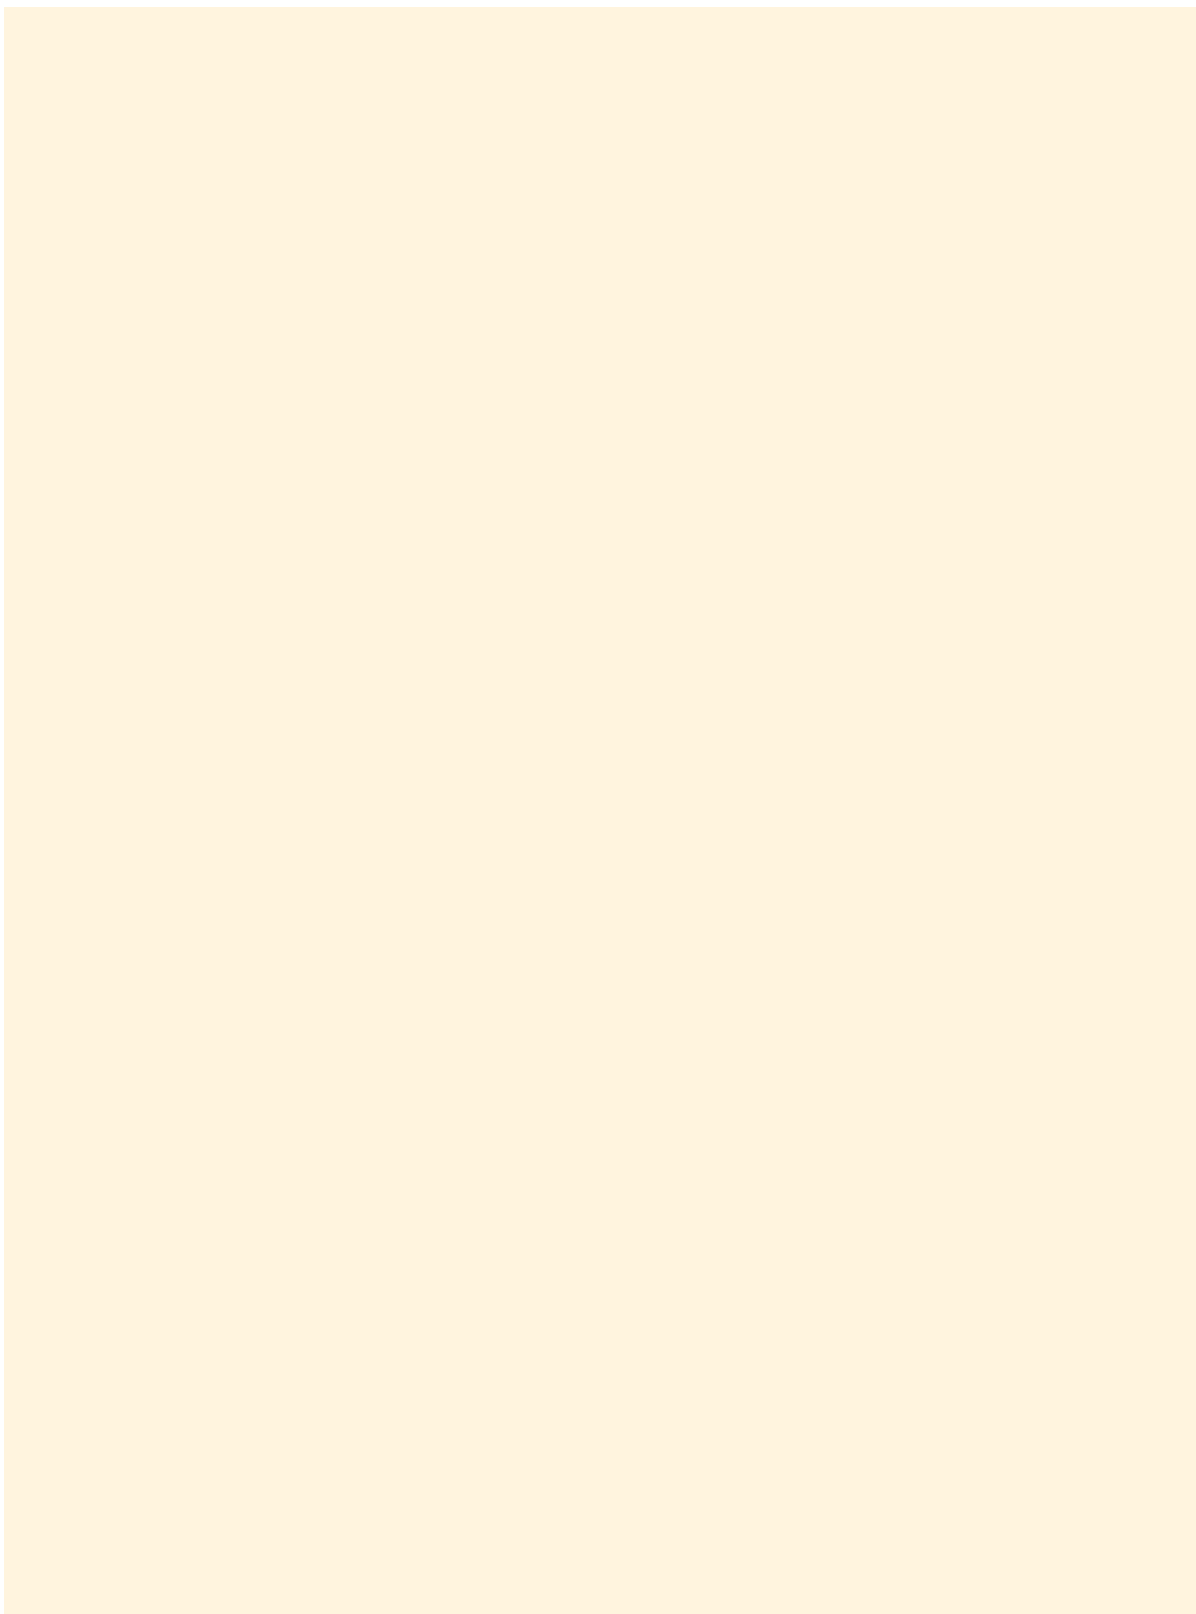

Feuerbach therefore fails to see that “religious feeling” is itself a social product, and that the abstract individual who he is analyzing belongs to a particular form of society. [...] The philosophers have only interpreted the world in different ways; the point is to change it.

Feuerbach and Marx thus argued that there was no objective basis for religion, whose origins were to be explained on societal or psychological grounds. This was further developed by Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), who offered a psychoanalytical account of belief in God as “wish-fulfilment.”

This reductionist approach to religious belief thus holds that religious ideas tell us nothing about God but a lot about human beings. This consideration is important in understanding the rise of “religious studies” in many universities. Although this is sometimes justified in terms of serving the needs of a multicultural society, some argue that the best reason for studying religion is to learn more about human nature itself.

This chapter has provided a brief exploration of the resources available to Christian theology and of some of the debates concerning their potential and their limitations. In the chapter that follows, we shall consider the notion of revelation, which plays a leading role in much Christian thought.

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD NATURAL AND REVEALED

In 2011, a six-year-old girl wrote a letter to God, asking “how he got invented.” Her father sent a copy to the archbishop of Canterbury, the noted theologian Rowan Williams (born 1950), asking him if he would like to comment. Williams replied as follows:

Dear Lulu – Nobody invented me – but lots of people discovered me and were quite surprised. They discovered me when they looked round at the world and thought it was really beautiful or really mysterious and wondered where it came from. They discovered me when they were very very quiet on their own and felt a sort of peace and love they hadn't expected. Then they invented ideas about me – some of them sensible and some of them not very sensible. From time to time I sent them some hints – especially in the life of Jesus – to help them get closer to what I'm really like.

This charming response from Williams to Lulu opens up the question of revelation. How can God be known? For some, God is to be sought out within the complexities and ambiguities of the world; for others, through experiences that seem to point beyond themselves; for others, in the person of Jesus Christ.

The issue being debated is fundamentally that of revelation – the Christian notion that God chooses to be known and makes this possible through self-disclosure in nature and human history. The great Scottish theologian Hugh Ross Mackintosh (1870–1936) once summarized the questions centering on revelation as follows: “A religious knowledge of God, wherever existing, comes by revelation; otherwise we should be committed to the incredible position that a man can know God without His willing to be known.”

The discussion of the nature and necessity of revelation within the Christian tradition has been both interesting and important, and will be addressed in this chapter. It raises some important questions, such as whether human nature is limited in its abilities and is unable to discern the existence or nature of God in this way. Humanity needs to be told what God is like. The Christian tradition is rich in imagery – such as that of “clouds” or “veils” – which hints at a natural human inability to see God fully.

One of the most significant aspects of this debate concerns the way in which a “natural” knowledge of God – acquired through reflection on the natural order – relates to a “revealed” knowledge of God. We shall consider this point in the second part of the chapter; our attention is first claimed by the question of what the term “revelation” might be understood to mean.

The Idea of Revelation

A central theme of Christian theology down the ages has been that God self-discloses. This theme is found throughout the Bible, and takes a number of forms. Three are of particular importance.

1. God is revealed through acting in history – as, for example, in the Exodus of Israel from Egypt, or the deliverance of the people of Jerusalem from their exile in Babylon. The act of delivering Israel from captivity in Egypt is understood by biblical writers as a revelation of God's power and love, which is to be celebrated by the annual Passover festival (Exodus 12: 14).
2. God is revealed through the beauty or majesty of the created order. “The heavens declare the glory of the Lord” (Psalm 19: 1). The immensity of the natural world is often seen as a manifestation of the glory of God. This is a major theme of the final section of the book of Job, which depicts God as inviting Job to survey the created order and appreciate his own insignificance in comparison to it (Job 38: 1 to 42: 6).

3. The identity and intentions of God are revealed through visions, dreams, or personal disclosures to individuals, such as Abraham and Moses. “The word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision, ‘Do not be afraid, Abram, I am your shield’” (Genesis 15: 1).

All three of these motifs are found in the New Testament but are supplemented by a distinctively Christian theme – namely, that God's self-revelation is focused, channeled, and embodied in the person of Jesus Christ. Christ is described as the “image [Greek: eikon] of the invisible God” (Colossians 1: 15).

The idea of divine self-revelation implies that unaided human attempts to fully discern the nature and purposes of God are ultimately unsuccessful. Although most Christian theologians hold that a natural knowledge of God is possible (pp. 141–8), any such natural knowledge is generally understood to be limited in scope, in coherence, and in depth. The idea of revelation expresses the basic Christian belief that we need to be “told what God is like” (Eberhard Jüngel).

In everyday use, the term “revelation” could be understood as “making something known in all its fullness” or “the total disclosure of what has hitherto been obscure or unclear.” Yet to speak of a “revelation of God” in a theological context does not imply that the self-revelation of God is total. For example, many writers within the Greek Orthodox tradition stress that the revelation of God does not abolish the mystery of God. John Henry Newman's (1801–90) doctrine of “reserve” emphasizes the same point. There is always more to God than what we can fully grasp. Martin Luther (1483–1546) suggested that, while God's self-revelation is only partial, this partial revelation is nevertheless reliable and adequate. He developed the idea of a “hidden revelation of God” – one of the most important aspects of his “theology of the cross” – to make this point.

Another meaning of revelation in everyday life is “making facts known.” For example, a newspaper headline might speak of a government “revealing” its new policies. The theological idea of revelation certainly includes this idea; however, it also implies more than just disclosing knowledge of God. A central theme here is the self-disclosure of God. In speaking about other people, we might draw a distinction between “knowing about someone” and “knowing someone.” The former implies cerebral knowledge, or an accumulation of data about an individual (such as height, occupation, and so on). The latter implies a personal relationship. In a Christian context, “revelation” implies both informational and relational knowledge of God. In its developed sense, “revelation” does not mean merely the transmission of a body of knowledge but the personal self-disclosure of God within history. We shall explore this question further later in this work, when we consider what it means to speak of a “personal God” (pp. 177–80).

First, we need to explore the models of revelation that are used in Christian theology. We shall focus on four models in the following section.

Models of Revelation

Revelation, in common with most theological notions, is a complex concept. The Greek word usually translated as “revelation” (apokalypsis) has the basic meaning of “removing a veil so that something can be seen.” In an attempt to unravel and cast light on the various elements of this idea, theologians have developed several models of revelation. We shall consider four such models, to which others could be added. It must be stressed that these are not mutually exclusive. They can be understood as different aspects or dimensions of a greater whole, each with its own distinct emphasis. The affirmation of one thus does not imply the negation of any one or all three of the remainder.

Revelation as Doctrine

This approach has been characteristic of Catholic neo-scholastic schools and conservative evangelicalism, and, in modified or supplement forms, continues to exercise considerable influence within the Christian tradition. Whereas evangelicals have stressed the role of Scripture in the mediation of revelation, Catholic neo-scholastics have generally given considerably more weight to the role of tradition, and especially the teaching office of the church (the magisterium). The term “the deposit of revelation” or “the deposit of truth,” meaning the accumulated insights of the church over the years, is often employed in such contexts. According to this approach, revelation is to be thought of primarily (although not exclusively) as the disclosure of a set of statements about God, such as “God is loving.”

This understanding of the nature of revelation underlies the dogmatic declarations of the First Vatican Council on the nature of faith, which include the following statement:

Wherefore, by divine and catholic faith all those things are to be believed which are contained in the Word of God as found in Scripture and tradition, and which are proposed by the church as matters to be believed as divinely revealed, whether by her solemn judgment or in her ordinary and universal magisterium.

It is clear that this approach regards revelation as taking the form of doctrinal statements which are set forth by the church, whether in Scripture or unwritten tradition. A propositional approach to divine revelation can be found in the writings of a number of Catholic theologians, most notably Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange (1877–1964). Faith is here understood as assent to revealed truths.

This approach is also taken by some conservative Protestants, who understand revelation as doctrinal information mediated through the Bible, which tends to be treated as a collection of propositional doctrinal statements, which may then be woven together to create the matrix of Christian theology. Such an approach can be found in the six volumes of Carl F. H. Henry's (1913–2003) God, Revelation, and Authority (1976–83), which has had some influence within American conservative evangelical circles. Henry's approach has clearly been influenced by Enlightenment rationalism, which helps explain its emphasis upon propositional revelation. “We mean by 'propositional revelation' that God supernaturally communicated his revelation to chosen spokesmen in the express form of cognitive truths." For Henry, revelation is "referential information about the nature of God" which is provided in the Bible.

Other writers within an evangelical tradition have resisted such purely propositional approaches and insisted that revelation is to be understood as the intermingling of divine action and divine words, as found in the writings of the leading evangelical James I. Packer (born 1926). In his Revisioning Evangelical Theology (1993), Stanley J. Grenz (1950–2005) affirmed that divine revelation was about the communication of divine truth. Yet he refused to limit such truth to propositional statements, arguing that more attention ought to be given to the role of narratives and tradition in disclosing the nature and character of God.

This approach is open to criticism on a number of grounds. Its critics suggest that it ignores how an understanding of literary genres informs the meaning of Bible verses, and overstates the role of propositions in the conveyance of truth. It is part of a traditional understanding of revelation, but not its totality. A propositional model of revelation need not exclude other models, in that these can be seen as complementary, rather than mutually exclusive. To assert that revelation involves information about God is not to deny that it can also involve the mediation of the presence of God, or the transformation of human experience. The core Christian idea of God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ invites us to think in terms of being shown what God is like, not simply being told what God is like.

For example, the Catechism of the Catholic Church affirms the importance of this revelation as the communication of truth about God, while also stressing the distinct idea of personal trust in or commitment to God: "Faith is first of all a personal adherence of man to God. At the same time, and inseparably, it is a free assent to the whole truth that God has revealed."

A purely cognitive understanding of revelation was criticized by the postliberal theologian George Lindbeck (born 1923) in his Nature of Doctrine (1984; see pp. 79, 132). Lindbeck argues that any attempt to understand revelation solely as “informational propositions or truth claims about objective realities” is to be rejected as intellectualist and literalist, as resting on the mistaken assumption that it is possible to state the objective truth about God definitively, exhaustively, and timelessly in a propositional form. There is an obvious truth in this point. Human language seems incapable of representing God fully.

Nevertheless, not all cognitive theories of doctrine are vulnerable in this respect. It is necessary to make a clear distinction between the view that an exhaustive and unambiguous account of God is transmitted through revelation conceptually by propositions, on the one hand, and the view that there is a genuinely cognitive element to doctrinal statements, on the other. For example, most theologians of the medieval period actually understood revelation as a dynamic concept. As the medieval theologian Alan of Lille (died 1202) pointed out, doctrine was to be seen as a “perception of divine truth, tending toward this truth.” For such theologians, revelation provides a reliable yet incomplete description of reality.

Revelation as Presence

In his influential work Nature, Man, God (1924), the British theologian William Temple (1881–1944) remarked that “what is offered to man's apprehension in any specific revelation is not truth concerning God, but the living God himself.” Related ideas can be found in earlier periods of church history. For example, the recognition that revelation involves a personal presence is stated with particular clarity in John Henry Newman's 1866 hymn “Praise to the Holiest”:

And that a higher gift than grace
Should flesh and blood refine;
God's presence and God's very self
And essence all-divine.

This model of revelation as divine presence came to be especially associated with Protestant theologians of the 1930s and 1940s who were influenced by the dialogical personalism of the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber (1878–1965; see pp. 179–80), such as Friedrich Gogarten (1887–1967), Emanuel Hirsch (1888–1972), Emil Brunner (1889–1966), Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–45). If revelation is understood as information about God, God is reduced to an “it”; if God is conceived as a “thou,” revelation must be thought of in terms of a relationship with an individual believer, or presence within that believer.

This approach is found in Brunner's Truth as Encounter (1937), which sets out the idea of revelation as a personal communication of God – that is to say, a communication or impartation of the personal presence of God within the believer. “The Lordship and love of God can be communicated in no other way than by God's self-giving.”

Brunner's point is that God does not merely convey information in the process of revelation. Revelation concerns the conveying of God's personal presence, rather than mere information concerning God. Brunner, basing his ideas upon Martin Buber's analysis of “I–thou” and “I–it” relationships, insists that there is a strongly relational element to revelation. God is experienced as a “thou” rather than an “it,” a person rather than an object. Revelation is teleological, a process directed toward a goal – and that goal is the establishment of a mutual relationship between the revealing God and responding humanity.

Brunner's concept of “truth as encounter” thus conveys the two elements of what he regards as a correct understanding of revelation: it is historical and personal. By the former, Brunner wishes us to understand that truth is not something permanent within the eternal world of ideas which is disclosed or communicated to us in revelation. Brunner is thus critical of any notion of revelation which represents itself as words or propositions about God. These objectify God, in the sense of reducing God to the status of an object, rather than a person. “No speech, no word, is adequate to the mystery of God as a Person.” Revelation cannot be understood purely as the impartation of data about God: “It is never the mere communication of knowledge, but a life-giving and life-renewing fellowship.”

Once more, critics of this model would rightly challenge its claim to be an exclusive account of the nature of revelation. It might be part of the picture; it is most certainly not the complete picture. Can you know somebody without knowing something about that person?

Revelation as Experience

A third influential model centers upon human experience. God is understood to be revealed or made known through the experience of the individual. Many Catholic modernists (see pp. 71–2) emphasized this kind of approach. George Tyrrell (1861–1909), for example, regarded the idea of revelation as information as inadequate.

Revelation was not about information but about the transformation of the soul. In an informal lecture given at King's College London in 1909, Tyrrell argued that revelation was experiential, rather than cognitive:

That Christ died is a proposition whose meaning is clear to all; that He died for our sins is also apprehensible intellectually for most; but its divine sense is revealed only in the light of inward spiritual experience – of our own divine and religious life. The revelation lies not in the word or statement nor in the intellectual thought that it evokes; but in the interior experience of redemption through Christ which it occasions and by which it is interpreted.

This approach is also associated with German liberal Protestantism in the nineteenth century, especially F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) and Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl (1822–89). Schleiermacher's background was that of Moravian Pietism, which placed considerable emphasis upon a personal devotion to Christ and the importance of a personal awareness of conversion. Most forms of eighteenth-century Pietism, including Methodism, placed considerable emphasis upon such notions as “experimental religion” (meaning “a religion grounded in experience”) and a “living faith” (as opposed to a wooden theological orthodoxy). We have already noted the importance of these themes for other Pietist writers, such as John Wesley (1703–91, pp. 45–6).

In 1796, Schleiermacher moved to Berlin to take up his new duties as a hospital chaplain. Within a year of his arrival, he had attached himself to “the Athenaeum,” a group of thinkers and writers who were hostile to the spirit of the Enlightenment. He became involved with leading figures of the Romantic movement, such as Novalis (1772–1801) and Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829). The outcome of this interaction was a theology deeply grounded in the outlook of Romanticism (see p. 237), with a new emphasis upon the role of the individual's religious consciousness and feeling. In his Christian Faith (revised edition, 1830–1), Schleiermacher emphasized that the Christian faith was not primarily conceptual; rather, doctrines were to be seen as second-order expressions of its primary religious truth, which is the experience of redemption. The essence of Christian piety is not some rational or moral principle, but “feeling” (das Gefühl), the immediate self-consciousness. It is this “feeling of absolute dependence” which is the starting point for Christian theology. As Alois E. Biedermann (1819–85) later commented, Schleiermacher's theology may be regarded as a critical exploration of the deep, inner feelings of humanity. The human intellect thus reflects upon human feeling, and by doing so interprets it.

One of the greatest weaknesses of the model can be seen through the criticisms directed against it by Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72), who argued that such “experience” was little more than “experience of the self.” We have already considered this difficulty (pp. 133–4) and noted its importance for experience-based theologies, such as that of Schleiermacher. The approach has also been criticized by postliberal writers such as George Lindbeck, who have argued that any appeal to an unmediated religious experience common to all of humanity is unmerited, in that it is a “false universal.”

Revelation as History

A quite distinct approach, especially associated with the German theologian Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–2014), centers on the theme of “revelation as history” (see p. 244). According to Pannenberg, Christian theology is based upon an analysis of universal and publicly accessible history, rather than the inward subjectivity of personal human existence or a special interpretation of that history. History itself is (or has the capacity to become) revelation. For Pannenberg, revelation is essentially a public and universal historical event which is recognized and interpreted as an “act of God.” Pannenberg's “Dogmatic Theses on the Doctrine of Revelation” (1968) set out this position in seven theses, of which the first five are of especial interest in relation to this model of revelation:

1. The self-revelation of God in Scripture did not take place directly, after the fashion of a theophany, but indirectly, in the acts of God in history. (A “theophany” is an appearance of God in a temporary form, not necessarily material, which is to be contrasted with the incarnation, in which God is understood to have been revealed permanently in the person of Christ.)
2. Revelation is not completely apprehended at the beginning, but only at the end of revelatory history.
3. In contrast to special divine manifestations, the revelation of God in history is publicly and universally accessible, and open to anyone who has eyes to see it.
4. The universal revelation of God is not fully realized in the history of Israel; it was first realized in the destiny of Jesus of Nazareth, insofar as the end of history is anticipated in that destiny.
5. The Christ-event cannot be regarded as revealing God in isolation; it is set in the context of the history of God's dealings with Israel.

On this basis, Pannenberg is able to argue for the resurrection of Christ as a central act of divine revelation in history, a point to which we shall return later in our analysis of the resurrection.

Pannenberg's approach to revelation has aroused excitement and criticism in about equal measure. The idea of establishing the gospel on the basis of universal history seemed a daring and creative gesture, allowing theology to reclaim the intellectual high ground that many had thought had long been forfeited to Marxism. In particular, it seemed to bypass the trap laid by Ludwig Feuerbach (see pp. 133–4), who had argued that Schleiermacher's approach to revelation, beginning from human experience, was little more than a theology constructed through the objectification of human feelings.

Pannenberg, by his appeal to history, believes that he is able to avoid the line of thought that leads to Feuerbach's impasse by insisting that theology arises out of history, not out of human feelings of redemption or the presence of God.

Natural Theology: Its Scope and Limits

We now turn to consider the important question of the manner and extent to which God may be known through the natural order. This important area of theological debate is traditionally known as “natural theology” and has assumed increased importance in recent years on account of the growing interest in promoting dialogue between Christian theology and the natural sciences. Might the study of the natural world lead to an increased appreciation of its creator?

“The heavens declare the glory of God; the heavens proclaim the work of God's hands” (Psalm 19: 1). This well-known text can be seen as representing a general theme within the Christian Bible – that something of the wisdom of the God who made the world can be known through the world that was created. The exploration of this theme has proved to be one of the most fruitful areas of theology.

Traditionally, natural theology is understood (especially by philosophers of religion) to refer to what can be known of God through the natural world, without any divine guidance or revelation. In his major study Perceiving God (1991), the American philosopher of religion William P. Alston (1921–2009) defines natural theology as “the enterprise of providing support for religious beliefs by starting from premises that neither are nor presuppose any religious beliefs.” In traditional Catholic thought, natural theology clears the ground for revealed theology, pointing to the existence and something of the character of God, without disclosing such mysteries as the Trinity or incarnation.

There has been considerable disagreement within Christian theology over both the definition and merits of “natural theology.” Six main approaches can be distinguished within the western theological tradition. These are not mutually inconsistent, and it is common to find theologians adopting more than one of these approaches.

1. Natural theology is the branch of philosophy which investigates what human reason unaided by revelation can tell us concerning God – “the enterprise of providing support for religious beliefs by starting from premises that neither are nor presuppose any religious beliefs” (William P. Alston). For many, this has become the default understanding of natural theology. This specific formulation of natural theology appears to have emerged in Protestant contexts during the early modern period primarily for apologetic reasons. Within Catholicism, this approach to natural theology is often linked with the First Vatican Council's declaration that God “can be known with certainty from the consideration of created things in the natural light of human reason.”
2. Natural theology sets to prove or confirm the existence of God by reflecting on the ordering and complexity of nature. This approach to natural theology is sometimes known as “physico-theology” and became particularly influential in England in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. William Paley's (1743–1805) famous Natural Theology (1802) is a good example of this kind of approach.
3. Natural theology is the intellectual outcome of the natural tendency of the human mind to desire or to be inclined toward God. This approach traditionally makes an appeal to the “natural desire to see God,” developed by Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74).

4. Natural theology is the exploration of analogy or intellectual resonance between the human experience of nature on the one hand and of the Christian gospel on the other. Natural theology thus articulates and expands the notion of an isomorphism between human reason and the structure of reality. Variants of this approach are found in the writings of Joseph Butler (1692–1752) and John Polkinghorne (born 1930).
5. Natural theology is an attempt to demonstrate that “naturalist” accounts of the natural world, which refuse to acknowledge the existence of God, are intrinsically deficient, and that a theistic approach is required to give a comprehensive and coherent interpretation of the natural order.
6. Natural theology is to be understood primarily as a “theology of nature” – that is, as a specifically Christian understanding of the natural world, reflecting the core assumptions of the Christian faith, which is to be contrasted with secular or naturalist accounts of nature. Such a theology of nature is often framed primarily in terms of a doctrine of creation.

We begin our discussion of natural theology by considering what is widely regarded as a landmark in this matter: the contribution of Thomas Aquinas, which has been particularly influential in Catholic theology.

Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) on Natural Theology

The doctrine of creation is of central importance to a classic approach to the concept of natural theology. This is perhaps best seen in what is widely regarded as one of the greatest texts to address this theme: Thomas Aquinas's Summa contra Gentiles (“Summary against the Gentiles”), written during the period 1259–61, initially at Paris and subsequently at Naples. One of its most significant discussions concerns the manner in which God may be understood to be related to the creation – a relationship which Aquinas analyzes in terms of causality, as follows.

For Aquinas, there exists a fundamental “likeness [similitudo] to God” within the created order as a consequence of God being the cause, in some sense of the word, of all created things. In that no created thing can be said to come into existence spontaneously, the existence of all things can be considered to be a consequence of a relationship of causal dependence between the creation and its creator. Using what are essentially Aristotelian categories of causality, Aquinas sets out a position which we may summarize as follows:

1. Suppose that A causes B.
2. Suppose also that A possesses a quality Q.
3. Then B will also possess that quality Q as a result of its being caused by A.

The full argument set out by Aquinas is complex and not without its difficulties; nevertheless, its conclusion is clear. There are, so to speak, physical or metaphysical fingerprints within what is caused which provide the basis for an inductive argument to the existence of that cause and allow at least some aspects of its nature to be established. If God made the world, God’s “signature” (so to speak) may be found within the created order. Aquinas puts this point as follows:

Meditation on [God's] works enables us, at least to some extent, to admire and reflect on God's wisdom. [...] We are thus able to infer God's wisdom from reflection upon God's works. [...] This consideration of God's works leads to an admiration of God's sublime power, and consequently inspires reverence for God in human hearts. [...] This consideration also incites human souls to the love of God's goodness. [...] If the goodness, beauty, and wonder of creatures are so delightful to the human mind, the fountainhead of God's own goodness (compared with the trickles of goodness found in creatures) will draw excited human minds entirely to itself.

Something of the torrent of God's beauty can thus be known in the rivulets of the beauty of the creation.

For Aquinas, one of the most fundamental qualities that are to be attributed to God is that of “perfection.” Although this concept can clearly be understood in moral terms, Aquinas uses it to characterize the distinctiveness of God in respect of the created order.

“Perfection” is a quality which is possessed by God, and is possessed by that which God has created:

1. to a lesser extent than this perfection is possessed by God; and
2. as a result of its having been created by God.

In this sense, “perfection” may be thought of as an attribute which is characteristic of God but which is reflected in the created order on account of the metaphysically primary relationship of God to all other things.

Subsequent Catholic approaches to natural theology have built upon, refined, or qualified the position first articulated by Thomas Aquinas. The First Vatican Council's “Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith” (1870) laid it down as a matter of faith that God has revealed himself in two ways, naturally and supernaturally:

Holy mother Church holds and teaches that God, the beginning and end of all things, can certainly be known by the light of natural human reason from created things: “his eternal power and divine nature, invisible though they are, have been understood and seen through the things he has made” (Romans 1: 20); nevertheless, it has pleased his wisdom and goodness to reveal himself and the eternal decrees of his will to the human race in another and supernatural way.

Two points of particular importance emerge from these later discussions. First, the recognition of a legitimate role for natural theology does not mean that reason has replaced faith. Nor does it mean that philosophical reflection has displaced the grace of God revealed in Christ. Faith and grace remain primary for all believers. Natural theology, however, offers the opportunity to establish certain truths by means common to all persons. It plays an important apologetic role. It is important to remember in this respect that Thomas Aquinas's Summa contra Gentiles is thought to have been written partly in order to help Islamic readers gain an understanding of Christian faith through shared beliefs based on reason.

Second, whatever can be known of God through nature is not to be taken as the “grounds” or “foundations” of additional, revealed truths. Many Catholic theologians are inclined to recognize a continuum between natural theology (that which is known of God by the light of natural reason) and revealed theology (that which is known by the light of faith). In contrast, many Protestants tend to accentuate the distinctiveness of natural and revealed knowledge of God at this point.

With this point in mind, let us turn to a classic Protestant account of natural theology, developed in the sixteenth century by John Calvin.

John Calvin (1509–64) on Natural Theology

The first book of Calvin's influential Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559) opens with an important discussion of how we can know anything about God. Calvin affirms that a general knowledge of God may be discerned throughout the creation – in humanity, in the natural order, and in the historical process itself. Two main grounds of such knowledge are identified: one subjective, the other objective. The first ground is a “sense of divinity” (sensus divinitatis) or a “seed of religion” (semen religionis), which has been planted within every human being by God. God has endowed human beings with some inbuilt sense or presentiment of the divine existence. It is as if something about God has been engraved in the heart of every human being. Calvin identifies three consequences of this inbuilt awareness of divinity: the universality of religion (which, if uninformed by the Christian revelation, degenerates into idolatry), a troubled conscience, and a servile fear of God. All of these, Calvin suggests, may serve as points of contact for the Christian proclamation. The second such ground lies in experience of, and reflection upon, the ordering of the world. The fact that God is creator, together with an appreciation of the divine wisdom and justice, may be gained from an inspection of the created order, culminating in humanity itself.

It is important to stress that Calvin makes no suggestion whatsoever that this knowledge of God from the created order is peculiar to, or even restricted to, Christian believers. Calvin is arguing that anyone, by intelligent and rational reflection upon the created order, should be able to arrive at the idea of God. The created order is a “theater” or a “mirror” for the displaying of the divine presence, nature, and attributes. Although invisible and incomprehensible, God wills to be known under the form of created and visible things, by donning the garment of creation.

There is within the human mind, and that by natural instinct, a sense of divinity. This we take to be beyond controversy. [...] There are innumerable witnesses in heaven and on earth that declare the wonders of his wisdom. Not only those more arcane matters for the closer observation of which astronomy, medicine, and all of natural science are intended, but also those which force themselves upon the sight of even the most unlearned and ignorant peoples, so that they cannot even open their eyes without being forced to see them.

Calvin thus commends the natural sciences (such as astronomy and medicine) on account of their ability to illustrate further the wonderful ordering of the creation, and the divine wisdom which this indicates. Significantly, however, Calvin makes no appeal to specifically Christian sources of revelation at this point. His argument is based upon empirical observation and reasoning. If Calvin introduces scriptural quotations, it is to consolidate a general natural knowledge of God rather than to establish that knowledge in the first place. There is, he stresses, a way of discerning God within creation which is common to those inside and outside the Christian community.

Having thus laid the foundations for a general knowledge of God, Calvin stresses its shortcomings; his dialogue partner here is the classical Roman writer Cicero (106–43 bc), whose On the Nature of the Gods is perhaps one of the most influential classical expositions of a natural knowledge of God. Calvin argues that the epistemic distance between God and humanity, already of enormous magnitude, is increased still further on account of human sin. Our natural knowledge of God is imperfect and confused, even to the point of contradiction on occasion. A natural knowledge of God serves to deprive humanity of any excuse to ignore the divine will; nevertheless, it is inadequate as the basis for a fully fledged portrayal of the nature, character, and purposes of God.

Having stressed this point, Calvin then introduces the notion of revelation. Scripture reiterates what may be known of God through nature, while simultaneously clarifying this general revelation and enhancing it. “The knowledge of God, which is clearly shown in the ordering of the world and in all creatures, is still more clearly and familiarly explained in the Word.” It is only through Scripture that the believer has access to knowledge of the redeeming actions of God in history, culminating in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. For Calvin, revelation is focused upon the person of Jesus Christ; our knowledge of God is mediated through him. God may thus be fully known only through Jesus Christ, who may in turn be known only through Scripture; the created order, however, provides important points of contact for and partial resonances of this revelation.

The basic idea here, then, is that a knowledge of God the creator may be had both through nature and through revelation, with the latter clarifying, confirming, and extending what may be known through the former. Knowledge of God the redeemer – which for Calvin is a distinctively Christian knowledge of God – may only be had by the Christian revelation, in Christ and through Scripture.

The Renaissance: God's Two Books

One of the most interesting ways of correlating natural and revealed theology became particularly influential at the time of the Renaissance. The metaphor of “God's two books” was used to indicate how nature and the Bible could be brought into a creative conversation. The “book of nature” was seen as indicative of God, while the “book of Scripture” was seen as providing this with greater intellectual substance, leading to salvation, not simply enhanced understanding. The Belgic Confession (1561) uses this framework in affirming that knowledge of God can come about by two quite different means:

First, by the creation, preservation, and government of the universe, which is before our eyes as a most beautiful book, in which all creatures, great and small, are like so many characters leading us to contemplate the invisible things of God, namely, his eternal power and Godhead, as the Apostle Paul declares (Romans 1: 20). All of these things are sufficient to convince humanity, and leave them without excuse. Second, he makes himself known more clearly and fully to us by his holy and divine Word; that is to say, as far as is necessary for us to know in this life, to his glory and our salvation.

The two key points made here are:

1. There are two modes of knowing God, one through the natural order and the second through Scripture.
2. The second mode is clearer and fuller than the first.

During the seventeenth century, the “two books” model gained wider cultural traction. Nature and Scripture came to be seen as two distinct yet complementary sources for a knowledge of God. Francis Bacon (1561–1626) commended the study of both the “book of God's word” and the “book of God's works” in his Advancement of Learning (1605). In his 1674 tract The Excellency of Theology Compared with Natural Theology, Robert Boyle (1627–91) noted that “as the two great books, of nature and of scripture, have the same author, so the study of the latter does not at all hinder an inquisitive man's delight in the study of the former.” At times, Boyle referred to the world as “God's epistle written to mankind.” Similar thoughts can be found expressed in the 1643 classic of Sir Thomas Browne (1605–82), Religio medici (“The Religion of a Physician”):

There are two books from whence I collect my divinity. Besides that written one of God, another of his servant, nature, that universal and publick manuscript, that lies expanded unto the eyes of all. Those that never saw him in the one have discovered him in the other.

This metaphor of the two books with the one divine author was of considerable importance in holding together Christian theology and piety and the emerging interest and knowledge of the natural world in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, and continues to be used today.

Eastern Orthodoxy on Natural Theology

Discussions of natural theology within the Christian tradition are often dominated by western voices. Yet it is important to note that the Orthodox tradition has developed a distinct approach to natural theology, which echoes at points some themes of the “two books” model. Basil of Caesarea (c.330–79), for example, emphasized how human beings naturally intuit God from the created order:

We were made in the image and likeness of our Creator, endowed with intellect and reason, so that our nature was complete and we could know God. In this way, continuously contemplating the beauty of creatures, as if they were letters and words, we could read God's wisdom and providence over all things.

The Orthodox emphasis on God's creating the world in a “rational” manner is of importance. Human rationality reflects the “image of God” and is able to grasp something of the nature of God from the work of creation. Where some later medieval theologians tended to emphasize the distinction between the “natural” and “supernatural” orders, Orthodoxy has always seen the fundamental distinction as being between the creator and the creature. Orthodoxy holds that it is thus legitimate to speak of “natural revelation” and “supernatural revelation,” and to see the latter as fulfilling the former. It generally rejects any scholastic or modernist tendency to ignore divine influence on human theological reflection on the world, as if humanity were unaided by God in this process of reflection.

The Romanian Orthodox writer Dumitru Stăniloae (1903–93) is an excellent representative of this tradition. In his Dogmatic Theology, originally published in Romanian in 1978, Stăniloae highlights the major themes of an Orthodox approach to natural theology:

The Orthodox Church makes no separation between natural and supernatural revelation. Natural revelation is known and understood fully in the light of supernatural revelation. [...] Supernatural revelation merely restores direction to and provides a more determined support for that inner movement maintained within the world by God through natural revelation. [...] Consequently supernatural revelation places natural revelation itself in a clearer light.

The Barth–Brunner Debate (1934)

For many, the landmark debate over natural theology was the 1934 exchange between the two Reformed Protestant theologians Karl Barth (1886–1968) and Emil Brunner (1889–1966). Karl Barth was noted for his early hostility toward any idea of natural theology. For Barth, “natural theology” represented a concerted human attempt to subvert revelation by declaring that what needs to be known about God can be determined without recourse to divine self-disclosure. Barth's hostility toward natural theology thus rested on his fundamental belief that it undermined the necessity and uniqueness of God's self-revelation. If knowledge of God can be achieved independently of God's self-revelation in Christ, it follows that humanity can dictate the place, time, and means of its knowledge of God.

For Barth, there is a close link between natural theology and the theme of human autonomy. As Barth understands the concept, natural theology affirms and expresses the human desire to find God on our own terms. Natural theology thus appears to posit a second source of revelation alongside Jesus Christ. For Barth, revelation is only to be had through God, as a consequence of God's gracious decision that God wishes to be known. There is no manner in which God can be known outside and apart from God's self-revelation.

Some were alarmed by this suggestion. What of those biblical passages which pointed toward some kind of natural knowledge of God, such as Romans 1: 19–20, which speaks of the invisible things of God being known through the created order? And what of Calvin's recognition of a natural knowledge of God? Surely a Reformed thinker like Barth should take his own tradition seriously? Emil Brunner was one of several Reformed theologians in the 1930s to express misgivings about Barth's negative assessment of natural theology.

In 1934, Brunner published a short work entitled Nature and Grace. In this work, he argued that “the task of our theological generation is to find a way back to a legitimate natural theology.” Brunner located this approach in the doctrine of creation, specifically the idea that human beings are created in imago Dei, “the image of God.” Human nature is constituted in such a way that there is an analog with the being of God. Despite the sinfulness of human nature, the ability to discern God in nature remains. Sinful human beings remain able to recognize God in nature and in the events of history, and to be aware of their guilt before God. There is thus a “point of contact” (German: Anknüpfungspunkt) for divine revelation within human nature.

Brunner had used this idea of the “point of contact” back in 1927, and it is integral to his understanding of human nature. For Brunner, human nature is constituted in such a way that there is a ready-made point of contact for divine revelation. Revelation thus addresses itself to a human nature which already has some idea of what that revelation is about. For example, take the gospel demand to “repent of sin.” Brunner argues that this makes little sense unless human beings already have some idea of what “sin” is. The gospel demand to repent is thus addressed to an audience which already has at least something of an idea of what “sin” and “repentance” might mean. Revelation brings with it a fuller understanding of what sin means – but, in doing so, it builds upon an existing human awareness of sin.

Barth believed that Brunner's positive evaluation of natural theology seemed to imply that God needed help to become known, or that human beings somehow cooperated with God in the act of revelation. “The Holy Spirit [...] needs no point of contact other than that which that same Spirit establishes.” For Barth, there was no “point of contact” inherent within human nature. Any such “point of contact” is itself the result of divine revelation. It is something evoked by the Word of God, rather than something that is a permanent feature of human nature. Barth had begun to have misgivings about Brunner's more “dialogical” approach to revelation in the late 1920s, and had already come close to severing their relationship in 1929.

While Barth's response to Brunner can be read in a number of ways, the most helpful is to see it as a rejection of the notion of continuity between the creation and its creator. For Barth, this idea was expressed by the concept of analogia entis: a correspondence between God and the creation resulting from the creation itself. Barth began to focus his attack on the idea of analogia entis from 1929 onward, and it is clear that he saw this notion underlying Brunner's approach to natural theology. Because of Barth's rejection of the analogia entis, human and divine language are not naturally convergent. As Barth later put it in Church Dogmatics, although humans are “permitted and commanded” to speak of God, their language “consists only in ‘approximations’ [... and] stands in need of correction at every point.” Even these “approximations” or “pictures” with which humans speak of God are in themselves unsuited to this object and thus inappropriate to express and affirm the knowledge of God. God – the living God who encounters us in Jesus Christ – cannot be appropriated by us in our own capacity. Natural theology thus rests upon a theologically flawed understanding of human nature, with important implications for how we use language about God and construct our concepts of God.

The debate over natural theology has not been settled by this landmark confrontation, and it continues to this day – supplemented by a not unwelcome subsidiary debate over what Barth and Brunner actually thought they were doing in their works of 1934.

Approaches to Discerning God in Nature

The doctrine of creation gives theological foundation to the notion of a natural knowledge of God. If God created the world, it is to be expected that God's creation should bear the mark of the divine handiwork. Just as the sculptor's distinctive style might be evident in the sculpture, or a painting might be signed with the artist's name, so the presence of God, it is argued, can be discerned within the creation. But in what part of creation? Where in creation is God to be found?

Three major answers may be discerned within the rich tradition of reflection upon this issue down the centuries: human reason, the ordering of the world, and the beauty of the world.

Human Reason

In his major treatise On the Trinity, Augustine of Hippo (354–430) argued that, if God is to be discerned within the creation, we ought to expect to find God at the height of that creation. The height of God's creation, Augustine argued (appealing to Genesis 1 and 2), is human nature. And, on the basis of the Neoplatonic presuppositions which he inherited from his cultural milieu, Augustine further argued that the height of human nature is the human capacity to reason. Therefore, he concluded, one should expect to find traces of God in human processes of reasoning. Augustine referred to these as “vestiges of the Trinity” (the Latin term vestigium means “a footprint”). On the basis of this argument, Augustine develops what have come to be known as “psychological analogies of the Trinity” (see pp. 312–13).

The Ordering of the World

We have already seen how Thomas Aquinas's arguments for the existence of God base themselves on the perception that there is ordering within nature, which requires to be explained. Equally, the fact that the human mind can discern and investigate this ordering of nature is of considerable significance. There seems to be something about human nature which prompts it to ask questions about the world. And there seems to be something about the world which allows answers to those questions to be given. The noted theoretical physicist and Christian apologist John Polkinghorne comments on this point as follows:

We are so familiar with the fact that we can understand the world that most of the time we take it for granted. It is what makes science possible. Yet it could have been otherwise. The universe might have been a disorderly chaos rather than an orderly cosmos. Or it might have had a rationality which was inaccessible to us. [...] There is a congruence between our minds and the universe, between the rationality experienced within and the rationality observed without.

There is a deep-seated congruence between the rationality present in our minds and the rationality – the orderedness – which we observe as present in the world. Thus, the abstract structures of pure mathematics – a free creation of the human mind – provide important clues to understanding the world. All of this, Polkinghorne argues, is a form of natural theology, preparing the way for the full knowledge of the Christian revelation.

The Beauty of the World

A number of theologians have developed natural theologies based on the sense of beauty that arises from contemplating the world. Perhaps the most powerful exploration of this theme is made by the celebrated American theologian Jonathan Edwards (1703–58):

The immense magnificence of the visible world in inconceivable vastness, the incomprehensible height of the heavens, etc., is but a type of the infinite magnificence, height and glory of God's world in the spiritual world: the most uncomprehensible expression of His power, wisdom, holiness and love in what is wrought and brought to pass in the world, and the exceeding greatness of the moral and natural good, the light, knowledge, holiness, and happiness which shall be communicated to it, and therefore to that magnificence of the world, height of heaven.

This sense of aesthetic ecstasy pervades Edwards's autobiographical writings, especially his Miscellanies. The perception of beauty that we experience “when we are delighted with flowery meadows and gentle breezes” is, for Edwards, an intimation of the holiness of God, which Scripture clarifies and confirms, placing it upon a reliable theological foundation.

Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88) is an example of a twentieth-century Catholic writer who stresses the theological importance of beauty. However, Balthasar distances himself from any idea of an “aesthetic theology.” His major work, The Glory of the Lord (1961–9), is best seen as a “theological aesthetics” rather than an “aesthetic theology.” The category of “beauty” is, according to Balthasar, to be reclaimed as a description of the revelation of God, rather than some human category which can be applied to God. Balthasar does not develop a philosophical argument from the beauty of nature to the existence of God. Rather, he argues that our experience of nature as beautiful is a consequence of faith, not its cause or condition. We do not approach God through beauty; rather, God approaches us through the beauty of Christ.

These, then, are some of the ways in which Christian theologians have attempted to describe the manner in which God can be known, however fleetingly and inadequately, through nature. Yet it is impossible to talk about “natural theology” without considering the importance of the increasingly influential dialogue now taking place between Christian theology and the natural sciences. So just what is the relationship between Christian theology and the natural sciences?

The Natural Sciences and Christian Theology: Models of Interaction

There has been a long history of interaction between Christian theology and the natural sciences. Historians of science generally take the view that theological factors generally played a significantly positive role in the emergence and persistence of modern science in the west. It is important to note that many of the key figures in the rise of the natural sciences were individuals with sincere religious commitments; perhaps more importantly, the new approaches to nature that they pioneered were underpinned in various ways by religious assumptions, particularly grounded in a Christian understanding of an ordered creation. Historians often focus on three themes which are regarded as important to any understanding of the religious origins of the scientific revolution in western Europe in the early modern period.

1. A Christian doctrine of creation affirms the notion of a regular universe, whose regularities can be uncovered by empirical study – an idea that was essential to the emergence of science. As Paul Davies (born 1946) pointed out, “in Renaissance Europe, the justification for what we today call the scientific approach to inquiry was the belief in a rational God whose created order could be discerned from a careful study of nature.”

2. Studying nature was widely seen as enhancing and deepening human appreciation of the wisdom and beauty of God. There was thus a fundamental religious motivation for the study of nature, in that the regularities and beauty of nature were seen as reflecting the character of its creator.
3. Many natural philosophers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries became increasingly suspicious of the reliability of unaided human reason as a way of arriving at truths about nature, using the kind of deductive processes familiar from Greek philosophy. This growing anxiety about the limits of the human rational capacity, traditionally expressed by the Christian doctrine of original sin, led natural philosophers to value the empirical method as a means of establishing reliable truths. Experiment, not pure reason, came to be seen as the basis of reliable knowledge of nature.

So what are the intellectual frameworks for understanding the present interaction between the natural sciences and Christian theology? A number of ways of categorizing these approaches have been proposed, such as the fourfold taxonomy proposed by Ian G. Barbour (1923–2013): conflict, independence, dialogue, and integration. Although this has been widely adopted by other writers in the field of science and religion, it has attracted criticism on a number of grounds. For our purposes, we shall simply note that it is not entirely suitable for exploring the relationship between theology (as opposed to the more generic notion of “religion”) and science. In what follows, we shall consider three broad approaches to the relationship between theology and science which are widely encountered within contemporary culture.

Warfare: The “Conflict” Thesis

One of the most influential understandings of the relationship between science and theology holds that they are in a state of permanent warfare. This viewpoint was popularized in the second half of the nineteenth century and has been given a new lease of life by its aggressive adoption by the “New Atheism,” especially obvious in Richard Dawkins's (born 1941) God Delusion (2006). It is only a matter of time before science, according to Dawkins, will eliminate religion. The “warfare” model of science and religion is now regarded as discredited by historians; this has not, however, prevented it from continuing to be influential, especially in popular culture.

Yet it is not merely the “New Atheism” that advocates the warfare of science and theology. This perspective is also found in more conservative forms of Protestantism, especially in the United States. According to this approach, the Genesis creation accounts represent a legitimate understanding of the origins of the world, which remain valid in the face of the rival theories offered by the natural sciences. This view does not regard biblical and scientific approaches as complementary. Rather, it regards the biblical material as presenting a valid and objective account of the origins and development of humanity, which is in tension with theories of evolution – and, for this reason, it says that theories of evolution are incorrect. This approach is particularly associated with conservative American evangelicalism. It is increasingly referred to as “scientific creationism,” as found in the works of writers such as Henry Madison Morris (1918–2006), particularly his Scientific Creationism (1974).

The idea that there is some essential conflict between science and theology is increasingly seen as unsustainable. The historical evidence suggests strongly that there have indeed been tensions between science and theology, just as there have also been synergies and convergence. The patterns are so complex that they simply cannot be reduced to some single “master narrative.”

Isolation: The “Non-Overlapping” Thesis

Many scientists find themselves attracted to the idea of the “NOMA” (non-overlapping magisteria) of science and theology. This idea was developed by the evolutionary biologist Stephen Jay Gould (1941–2002) as a means of diminishing the hostility between science and religion on university campuses. According to Gould's view, the “magisterium of science” deals with the “empirical realm,” whereas the “magisterium of religion” deals with “questions of ultimate meaning.” (The term “magisterium” is best understood as a “sphere of authority” or “domain of competency.”) Gould holds that these two magisteria do not, and cannot, overlap. They don't need to talk to each other, and they can't talk to teach other, in that they have nothing much in common.

A similar approach is adopted by theologians who want to emphasize the distinctiveness of Christian theology's methods and ideas. Partly in reaction against the tendency of various forms of liberal theology to accommodate to secular ideas and methods, neo-orthodoxy affirmed the distinctiveness of theology. This tendency can probably be seen at its clearest in Karl Barth's discussion of the doctrine of creation in his Church Dogmatics. For Barth, creation is a theological event which cannot be illuminated or interpreted in the light of the natural sciences. Barth's refusal to allow philosophy to have any foundational role in theology is thus extended to the natural sciences. They have their proper spheres of competence; these do not, however, include the justification or explanation of the Christian faith.

A similar approach is found in the writings of American theologians influenced by neo-orthodoxy. A good example is provided by Langdon Gilkey (1919–2004) in his Maker of Heaven and Earth (1959). Gilkey suggests that theology and the natural sciences are best understood as independent and different ways of approaching reality. The natural sciences ask “how” questions; theology asks “why” questions. The former deal with secondary causes (that is, with interactions within nature); the latter deals with primary causes (that is, the ultimate origin and purpose of nature in the first place).

The distinctiveness of the disciplines is also affirmed by Karl Rahner (1904–84). Using a framework similar to that adopted by Gilkey, Rahner argues that the sciences are concerned with “a posteriori experiences,” whereas theology deals with “a priori questions.” Rahner argues that things begin to go wrong when scientists start playing at being theologians, and vice versa, in that they refuse to respect the distinctive characteristics and limitations of the other group's disciplines.

Enrichment: The Complementarity Thesis

Whereas neo-orthodoxy regarded theology and the natural sciences as having independent agendas and methodologies, some more recent writers have argued for the need for a constructive dialogue between the two disciplines. While respecting the different methods and sources of science and theology, they can be seen as offering illumination of some aspects of life and thought which have the potential, at least in some respects, to enrich our vision of reality.

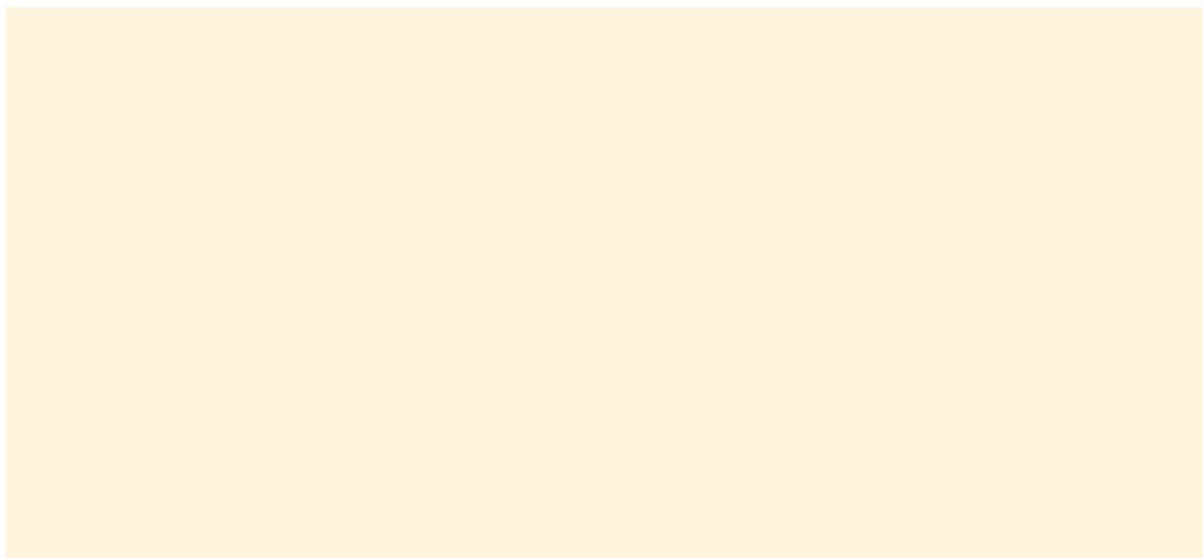

A good example is found in the writings of Wolfhart Pannenberg, who argued that the insights of the natural sciences can illuminate the Christian understanding of the doctrine of creation. Although Pannenberg insists that the two disciplines are distinct, he maintains that they can mutually interact, to the benefit of both.

Related ideas can be found in the writings of the leading Scottish theologian Thomas F. Torrance (1913–2007). Torrance argues that both theology and the natural sciences are committed to some form of realism, in that they deal with a reality whose existence is prior to their attempts to comprehend it. Both require openness to the way things are, and that their modes of inquiry are conformed to the nature of the reality that they encounter. Torrance's view is grounded in an approach which stresses the priority of God's self-revelation. This is seen as an objective reality, independent of human rational activity. Although Torrance is no uncritical supporter of Barth, this is unquestionably one area in which he identifies with Barth's agenda.

I develop a similar approach in the three volumes of my Scientific Theology (2001–3), where I argue that both the natural sciences and Christian theology represent an engagement with an external reality that is open to being represented theoretically. “A scientific theology conceives the theological enterprise as a principled attempt to give an account of the reality of God, which it understands to be embedded at different levels in the world.” I develop a form of critical realism that acknowledges the active involvement of the knower in the process of knowing, while I use Roy Bhaskar's (1944–2014) notion of the “stratification of reality” to explore the various levels of theological analysis.

More recently, I argue in Inventing the Universe (2015) for the need to enrich both scientific and theological narratives by allowing them to interact with each other. The scientific narrative of the origins of the cosmos is not the same as the Christian narrative of creation; the two can, however, be intertwined, like a dual helix, to offer a more satisfying vision of our universe.

In this chapter, we have looked at a number of issues arising from the important theological notion of revelation, and have touched on some issues about how God might be known through nature or reason. In the next chapter, we shall consider the dialogue and debate between philosophy and theology, which has been – and continues to be! – a fascinating aspect of Christian theology.

Questions for Chapter 7

1. What do you understand by the term “revelation”?
2. Many theologians argue that theology is fundamentally an exposition of the revealed truths found in the Bible. What are the strengths and weaknesses of this approach?
3. Why does Emil Brunner place such an emphasis upon truth as a personal notion? What points does he aim to make in this way? What criticisms might be directed against this position?
4. What impact does the idea of the “two books” of divine revelation have for the relationship between Christian theology and the natural sciences?
5. Give a critical assessment of the issues lying behind the debate between Barth and Brunner about natural theology.
6. How would you assess the merits of the basic approaches to the relationship between the natural sciences and Christian theology noted in this chapter?

PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY

DIALOGUE AND DEBATE

“What,” asked Tertullian (c.160–c.220) in the third century, “has Athens to do with Jerusalem? Or the Academy with the church?” The point behind Tertullian's famous question was the relationship between Christian theology and secular philosophy, especially Platonism. The Greek city of Athens was the home of the Academy, an institution of secular learning founded by Plato in 387 bc. For Tertullian, Christian theologians inhabited a completely different mental world from their pagan counterparts. How could there be a dialogue between them? Surely pagan philosophy would contaminate Christianity, and lead it astray?

Yet others were not so sure about this attitude, and encouraged a friendly dialogue and constructive engagement with the world of secular philosophy. Was not all truth God's truth? Surely there was a case for a dialogue between Christian theology and secular philosophy? Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165) adopted a particularly warm attitude to Platonism during the second century, prompting his critics to suggest he had merely baptized Platonist ideas without interacting with them sufficiently critically. Augustine (354–430) commended a critical and selective appropriation of secular philosophy, likening this process to plundering Egypt of its riches at the time of the Exodus under Moses. Was not Moses “learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians” (Acts 7: 22)?

A similar approach was recommended by Basil of Caesarea (c.330–79) in a fourth-century lecture given to young believers who were wondering whether they should continue to read pagan works of philosophy:

We shall gladly accept those passages in which they praise virtue or condemn vice. For those who are looking for more than just pleasure and amusement in these writers will find things of value to their souls, just as bees know how to extract honey from flowers (which to us are pleasant only for their fragrance and their colour). We should use these writings in the same way as bees use flowers. The bees do not visit all the flowers indiscriminately, nor do they try to carry away the whole flower on which they alight. Rather, they take whatever seems adapted to their needs, and leave the rest behind. In the same way, we can take away from heathen books whatever helps us and is linked to the truth, and ignore the rest.

More recently, John Paul II (1920–2005) emphasized the importance of dialogue between theology and philosophy. In his encyclical letter Fides et Ratio (Latin: “Faith and Reason,” 1998), he praised the integrity of philosophy and affirmed its role in helping the church explore, defend, and communicate its ideas:

The Church cannot but set great value upon reason's drive to attain goals which render people's lives ever more worthy. She sees in philosophy the way to come to know fundamental truths about human life. At the same time, the Church considers philosophy an indispensable help for a deeper understanding of faith and for communicating the truth of the Gospel to those who do not yet know it.

Christian theology and secular philosophy often deal with similar questions, even if they may answer them in different ways on the basis of different resources. How do we obtain secure knowledge? What is the status of religious language? Can God's existence be said to be “proved”? It is a huge subject, demanding several volumes in its own right to survey it adequately. In what follows, we offer what can only be a very brief introduction to the general themes of the discussion, in the hope that readers will want to take the subject further. It will help readers to set the context for some of the major debates they will encounter in the course of their reading, including in the present volume.

Philosophy and Theology: The Notion of the “Handmaid”

One of the most interesting aspects of Christian theology is the manner in which it has interacted with various schools of philosophy throughout the two thousand years of its existence. These schools of thought have at times been seen as allies and at times enemies of the Christian faith, as we noted when considering the interaction of Christianity with classical culture (pp. 99–103).

There is a long history within Christian theology of drawing on intellectual resources outside the Christian tradition as a means of developing a theological vision. This approach, usually referred to using the Latin phrase ancilla theologiae, is grounded in the basic idea that philosophical systems can be a very helpful way of stimulating theological development and of enabling a dialogue to be opened up between Christian thinkers and their cultural environment. The two most important historical examples of this approach to theology are the dialogues with Platonism and Aristotelianism.

The dialogue with Platonism was of immense importance during the first five centuries of the Christian church, especially in the Greek-speaking world of the eastern Mediterranean. As Christianity expanded in that region, it encountered rival worldviews, of which Platonism was the most important. Such worldviews could be seen positively or negatively: they were an opportunity for dialogue and intellectual development but also a threat to the existence of Christianity. The task faced by writers such as Justin Martyr and Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215) was how to make use of the obvious intellectual merits of Platonism in constructing a Christian worldview, without compromising the integrity of Christianity itself. After all, despite their occasional similarities, Christianity is not Platonism.

A new debate opened up in the thirteenth century, during the golden age of scholastic theology. The rediscovery of Aristotle by medieval writers seemed to offer new resources to help in every aspect of intellectual life, including physics, philosophy, and ethics. It was inevitable that theologians should also want to see what use they could make of Aristotelian ideas and methods in constructing a systematic theology – such as Thomas Aquinas's (c.1225–74) massive Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”), widely regarded as one of the greatest works of theology ever written.

In both these cases, using another intellectual discipline as the ancilla theologiae offers opportunities and risks in about equal measure. It is clearly important to appreciate what these opportunities and risks are. The two major opportunities offered to theology by the critical appropriation of another discipline can be summarized as follows.

1. It allows for a much more rigorous exploration of ideas than would otherwise be possible. Problems that Christian theology encounters in trying to develop its ideas often have their parallels in other disciplines. Thomas Aquinas, for example, found Aristotle's notion of an “unmoved mover” helpful in setting out some defenses of the existence of God.
2. It allows Christian theology to engage in a dialogue with another worldview – a major element of the church's witness to its secular context. In the second century, Justin Martyr clearly believed that many Platonists would be so impressed by the parallels between Platonism and Christianity that they might consider conversion. Similarly, in his “Areopagus address” (Acts 17: 22–31), Paul draws on some themes from Stoic philosophy in attempting to communicate the Christian message to Athenian culture.

Yet, alongside these positive aspects of such an engagement, an obvious risk must also be noted – that ideas which are not distinctively Christian come to play a significant (perhaps even normative) role in Christian theology. For example, Aristotelian ideas about the proper manner of logical reasoning, or Cartesian ideas about the proper starting point for any intellectual discipline, might find their way into Christian theology. On some occasions, this might turn out to be a neutral development; on others, it may eventually be recognized to have negative implications, undermining the integrity of Christian theology and ultimately causing it to be distorted. Martin Luther (1483–1546), the great German reformer, argued that medieval theology had allowed a number of such distortions to arise through an excessive, and partially uncritical, use of Aristotelian ideas in the Middle Ages.

Despite these concerns, the approach continues to be widely used. Many German theologians of the nineteenth century found G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831) and Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) to be helpful dialogue partners. In the twentieth century, Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) and Paul Tillich (1886–1965) both found a dialogue with existentialism to be theologically productive. The philosophy of “dialogical personalism” opens up some helpful lines of reflection on what it means to speak of God as a “person” (pp. 177–81). More recently, some theologians – such as Thomas F. Torrance (1913–2007) and the author of this volume, Alister McGrath (born 1953) – have argued that the natural sciences are an obvious and productive dialogue partner for Christian theology, helping us to understand how human language and concepts can express the nature of reality.

In what follows, we shall consider two of the most important discussions which stand at the interface of theology and philosophy, beginning with perhaps the most famous of all: can God's existence be proved?

Can God's Existence be Proved? Four Approaches

The relationship between faith and reason is often discussed in terms of whether God's existence can be proved and whether such proof would be adequate to bring a nonbeliever to faith. Although some writers have suggested that this is the case, the general consensus within Christian theology seems to be that, although reason does not bring individuals to faith in God, believers are nonetheless able to give rational reasons for their faith in God. The Austrian philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951) made this point clearly in his Culture and Value:

A proof of God's existence ought really to be something by means of which one could convince oneself that God exists. But I think that what believers who have furnished such proofs have wanted to do is to give their “belief” an intellectual analysis and foundation, although they themselves would never have come to believe as a result of such proofs.

So is it possible to “prove” God's existence? Or is proof something that is limited to mathematics and logic? Although many modern writers – such as Baruch Spinoza (1632–77) and René Descartes (1596–1650) – held that this kind of belief should be proved by clear and necessary reasons, postmodern philosophers – such as Wittgenstein – take the view that such beliefs must be seen as “fiduciary” (things that we believe, or regard as trustworthy). Why? Because, in the end, they rest upon commitments whose truth must be assumed and cannot be demonstrated.

Although discussion of the existence of God goes back to the classical period, the classic exploration of such questions, to which all modern discussion makes reference, is to be found in the Middle Ages. In particular, discussion of “proofs” of the existence of God generally take statements made by Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109) in the eleventh century, and Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century, as their starting points. Anselm developed what has come to be known as “the ontological argument” for the existence of God. Aquinas developed the “Five Ways,” arguing from the effects of nature to their cause in God its creator. We shall consider these two categories of arguments individually, before moving on to consider some more recent discussions of the theme.

The Ontological Argument of Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109)

Anselm of Canterbury was born in Italy. He migrated to Normandy in 1059 and entered the famous monastery of Bec, becoming its prior in 1063 and its abbot in 1078. In 1093, he moved to England, having been appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He is chiefly noted for his strong defense of the intellectual foundations of Christianity, and is especially associated with the “ontological argument” for the existence of God. This ontological argument was first set out in his Proslogion, a work which dates from 1079. (The term “ontological” refers to the branch of philosophy which deals with the notion of “being.”) It is important to realize that Anselm himself does not refer to his discussion as an “ontological” argument; in fact, he does not really consider it even to be an argument. The Proslogion is really a work of meditation, not of logical argument, in which Anselm reflects on how self-evident the idea of God has become to him, and what the implications of this might be.

In the Proslogion, Anselm offers a definition of God as “that than which no greater thing can be conceived.” So what are the implications of this? Anselm argues that, if someone agrees that God is indeed “that than which no greater thing can be conceived” and then argues that there is no God, there is a contradiction. Why? Because we can conceive of something still greater than a nonexistent God – namely, a God who exists.

God is thus defined as “that than which nothing greater can be conceived.” Now, the idea of such a being is one thing; the reality is another. Thinking of a hundred-dollar bill is quite different from having a hundred-dollar bill in your hands – and much less satisfying, as well! Anselm's point is this: the idea of something is inferior to the reality. So the idea of God as “that than which nothing greater can be conceived” contains a contradiction – because the reality of God would be superior to this idea. In other words, if this definition of God is correct, and exists in the human mind, then the corresponding reality must also exist.

It may be helpful to set out Anselm's argument in a series of numbered steps, so that each individual stage in the discussion can be appreciated.

1. God is the greatest possible being.
2. God exists in the human mind or understanding.

3. A being who exists only as a mental notion is not so great as a being who exists in reality and not merely as a mental idea.
4. If God exists only in the human mind, then God is not the greatest possible being.
5. It therefore follows that God must exist both in reality and as an idea in the mind.

Anselm expresses these points as follows, in a passage which has been studied intently (and, it must be said, also inconclusively) down the centuries:

This [definition of God] is indeed so true that it cannot be thought of as not being true. For it is quite possible to think of something whose nonexistence cannot be thought of. This must be greater than something whose nonexistence can be thought of. So if this thing (than which no greater thing can be thought) can be thought of as not existing, then, that very thing than which a greater thing cannot be thought is not that than which a greater cannot be thought. This is a contradiction. So it is true that there exists something than which nothing greater can be thought, that it cannot be thought of as not existing. And you are this thing, O Lord our God!

One obvious difficulty with this argument is that it is open to parody. Parallel arguments purporting to prove the existence of any perfect thing at all can be constructed. The most famous of these responses came from an eleventh-century Benedictine monk, Gaunilo of Marmoutiers, and is generally known as “A Reply on Behalf of the Fool” (an allusion to Psalm 14: 1, cited by Anselm: “The fool says in his heart that there is no God”). There is, according to Gaunilo, an obvious logical weakness in Anselm’s “argument” (although, as we noted earlier, Anselm does not really regard it as an argument in the first place). Imagine, Gaunilo suggests, an island, so lovely that a more perfect island cannot be conceived. By the same argument, Gaunilo suggests, that island must exist, in that the reality of the island is necessarily more perfect than the mere idea. Gaunilo sets out his objections as follows:

People say that somewhere in the ocean there is an island which, because of the difficulty (or rather the impossibility) of finding that which does not exist, some have called the "Lost Island." And we are told that it is blessed with all manner of priceless riches and delights in abundance, far more than the Happy Isles, and, having no owner or inhabitant, it is superior in every respect in the abundance of its riches to all those other lands that are inhabited by people. Now, if someone were to tell me about this, I shall easily understand what is said, since there is nothing difficult about it. But if I am then told, as though it were a direct consequence of this: "You cannot any more doubt that this island that is more excellent than all other lands truly exists somewhere in reality than you can doubt that it is in your mind; and since it is more excellent to exist not just in your mind but in reality as well, therefore it must exist."

The response offered by Gaunilo is widely regarded as exposing a potentially serious weakness in Anselm's argument. In much the same way, we might argue that the idea of a hundred-dollar bill seems, according to Anselm, to imply that we have such a bill in our hands. The mere idea of something – whether a perfect island or God – thus does not guarantee its existence.

Anselm, however, is not so easily dismissed. Part of his argument is that it is an essential part of the definition of God that he is "that than which nothing greater can be conceived." God therefore belongs to a category totally different from islands or dollar bills. It is part of the nature of God to transcend everything else. Once the believer has come to understand what the word "God" means, God really does exist for him or her. This is the intention of Anselm's meditation in the Proslogion: to reflect on how the Christian understanding of the nature of God reinforces belief in his reality. The "argument" does not really have force outside this context of faith, and Anselm never intended it to be used in this general philosophical manner.

Furthermore, Anselm argued that Gaunilo had not entirely understood him. The argument which he set out in the Proslogion did not involve the idea that there is a being that is, as a matter of fact, greater than any other being; rather, Anselm had argued for a being so great that a greater one could not even be conceived. The argument continues, and it remains a disputed question to this day whether Anselm's argument has a genuine basis.

Modern discussion of the argument has been influenced by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant, widely agreed to be the founder of modern critical philosophy. Kant was born in the German town of Königsberg (now the Russian city of Kaliningrad) in 1724 and was educated at the local university, where he became professor of logic and metaphysics. His major writings include the Critique of Pure Reason (1781), Critique of Practical Reason (1788), and Religion within the Bounds of Reason Alone (1793). Kant offered a major critique of the ontological argument for the existence of God, the central thesis of which takes the following form.

Kant insists that “existence is not a predicate.” Anselm's ontological argument improperly treats existence as some kind of property that things either possess or lack. According to Kant, to say that a thing “exists” is not to attribute existence to that thing but to say that this thing is exemplified in the world. As a result, being able to conceive the idea of God does not necessarily lead to the further idea “God exists.” Kant uses an analogy of a hundred dollars to make more or less the same point made earlier by Gaunilo with his image of the “ideal island”: conceiving an idea does not imply that its object necessarily exists. Kant makes this point as follows:

Now “Being” is clearly not a genuine predicate; that is, it is not a concept of something which could be added to the concept of a thing. It is merely the positing of a thing, or of certain determinations, as existing in themselves. Logically, it is merely the copula of a judgment. The proposition “God is omnipotent” contains two concepts, each of which has its object – God and omnipotence. The little word “is” adds no new predicate, but only serves to posit the predicate in its relation to the subject. Now if we take the subject (God) with all its predicates (among which is omnipotence), and say “God exists,” or “There is a God,” we do not attach any new predicate to the concept of God; we merely posit the subject in itself with all its predicates.

This line of argument had considerable influence within Christian theology, especially in the field of apologetics. Anselm's argument, however, continues to find its supporters, and remains an important stimulus to the contemporary debate about the validity and utility of arguments for the existence of God. For example, Alvin Plantinga (born 1932) and others have restated the argument in a manner which emphasizes the internal consistency of the existence of God:

Our verdict on these reformulated versions of St. Anselm's argument must be as follows. They cannot, perhaps, be said to prove or establish their conclusion. But since it is rational to accept their central premise, they do show that it is rational to accept that conclusion.

The “Five Ways” of Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74)

Thomas Aquinas was probably the most famous and influential theologian of the Middle Ages. Born in Italy, he achieved his fame through his teaching and writing at the University of Paris and other northern universities. His fame rests chiefly on his Summa theologiae, composed toward the end of his life and not totally finished at the time of his death. However, he also wrote many other significant works, particularly the Summa contra Gentiles (“Summary against the Gentiles”), which represents a major statement of the rationality of the Christian faith, and especially the existence of God. Aquinas believed that it was entirely proper to identify pointers toward the existence of God, drawn from general human experience of the world. His “Five Ways” represent five lines of argument in support of the existence of God, each of which draws on some aspect of the world which “points” to the existence of its creator.

So what kinds of pointers does Aquinas identify? The basic line of thought guiding Aquinas is that the world mirrors God, as its creator – an idea which is given more formal expression in his doctrine of the “analogy of being.” Just as an artist might sign a painting to identify it as his or her handiwork, so God has stamped a divine “signature” upon the creation. What we observe in the world – for example, its signs of ordering – can be explained on the basis of the existence of God as its creator. God is both its first cause and its designer. God both brought the world into existence and impressed the divine image and likeness upon it.

So where might we look in creation to find evidence for the existence of God? Aquinas argues that the ordering of the world is the most convincing evidence of God's existence and wisdom. This basic assumption underlies each of the “Five Ways,” although it is of particular importance in the case of the argument often referred to as the “argument from design” or the “teleological argument.” We shall consider each of these “ways” individually, before focusing on two later in this chapter.

The first way begins from the observation that things in the world are in motion or change. The world is not static, but dynamic. Examples of this are easy to list. Rain falls from the sky. Stones roll down valleys. The earth revolves around the sun (a fact, incidentally, unknown to Aquinas). This, the first of Aquinas's arguments, is normally referred to as the “argument from motion”; however, it is clear that the “movement” in question is actually understood in more general terms, so that the term “change” is more appropriate as a translation at points.

So how did nature come to be in motion? Why is it changing? Why is it not static? Aquinas argues that everything that moves is moved by something else. For every motion, there is a cause. Things do not just move – they are moved by something else. Now each cause of motion must itself have a cause. And that cause must have a cause as well. And so Aquinas argues that there is a whole series of causes of motion lying behind the world as we know it. Now, since there cannot be an infinite number of these causes, Aquinas argues, there must be a single cause right at the origin of the series. From this original cause of motion, all other motion is ultimately derived. This is the origin of the great chain of causality that we see reflected in the way the world behaves. From the fact that things are in motion, Aquinas thus argues for the existence of a single, original cause of all this motion – and this, he concludes, is none other than God.

The existence of God can be proved in five ways. The first and most obvious proof is the argument from change. It is clearly the case that some things in this world are in the process of changing. Now everything that is in the process of being changed is changed by something else. [...] If, then, whatever is changing it is itself changed, this also must be changed by something else, and this in turn by something else again. But this cannot go on forever, since there would then be no first cause to this process of change, and consequently no other agent of change, because secondary things which change cannot change unless they are changed by a first cause, in the same way as a stick cannot move unless it is moved by the hand. We are therefore bound to arrive at a first cause of change which is not changed by anything, and everyone understands that this is God.

Once more, it may be helpful to summarize this argument as a series of brief statements, so that its basic structure is clearer.

1. There is motion in the universe – for example, a stick moves.
2. Things do not move themselves; they are moved by something else. Something moves the stick.
3. There cannot be an infinite regression of things being moved by other things.
4. Therefore there must be a “prime mover,” who is not moved by anything else.
5. This unmoved prime mover is God.

The second way begins from the idea of causation. In other words, Aquinas notes the existence of causes and effects in the world. One event (the effect) is explained by the influence of another (the cause). The idea of motion, which we looked at briefly above, is a good example of this cause-and-effect sequence. Using a line of reasoning similar to that used above, Aquinas thus argues that all effects may be traced back to a single original cause – which is God.

The third way concerns the existence of contingent beings. In other words, the world contains beings (such as human beings) which are not there as a matter of necessity. Aquinas contrasts this type of being with a necessary being (one who is there as a matter of necessity). While God is a necessary being, Aquinas argues that humans are contingent beings. The fact that we are here needs explanation. Why are we here? What happened to bring us into existence? Aquinas argues that a being comes into existence because something which already exists brought it into being. In other words, our existence is caused by another being. We are the effects of a series of causation. Tracing this series back to its origin, Aquinas declares that this original cause of being can only be someone whose existence is necessary – in other words, God.

The fourth way begins from human values, such as truth, goodness, and nobility. Where do these values come from? What causes them? Aquinas argues that there must be something which is in itself true, good, and noble, and that this brings into being our ideas of truth, goodness, and nobility. The origin of these ideas, Aquinas suggests, is God, who is their original cause.

The fifth, and final, way is often referred to as “the teleological argument” or the “argument from design.” Aquinas notes that the world shows obvious traces of intelligent design. Natural processes and objects seem to be adapted with certain definite objectives in mind. They seem to have a purpose. They seem to have been designed. But things don't design themselves: they are caused and designed by someone or something else. Arguing from this observation, Aquinas concludes that the source of this natural ordering must be conceded to be God.

Most of Aquinas's arguments are rather similar in terms of their structure. Each depends on tracing a causal sequence back to its single origin, and identifying this with God. A number of criticisms of the “Five Ways” were made by Aquinas's critics during the Middle Ages, such as Duns Scotus (1266–1308) and William of Ockham (c.1285–1347). The following are especially important.

1. Why is the idea of an infinite regression of causes impossible? For example, the argument from motion only really works if it can be shown that the sequence of cause and effect stops somewhere. There has to be, according to Aquinas, a Prime Unmoved Mover. But he fails to demonstrate this point.
2. Why do these arguments lead to belief in only one god? The argument from motion, for example, could lead to belief in a number of Prime Unmoved Movers. There seems to be no especially pressing reason for insisting that there can only be one such cause, except for the fundamental Christian insistence that, as a matter of fact, there is only one such god.
3. These arguments do not demonstrate that God continues to exist. Having caused things to happen, God might cease to exist. The continuing existence of events does not necessarily imply the continuing existence of their originator. Aquinas's arguments, Ockham suggests, might lead to a belief that God existed once upon a time – but not necessarily now. Ockham developed a somewhat complex argument, based on the idea of God continuing to sustain the universe, which attempts to get round this difficulty.

These, then, are some of the classic arguments that have been developed and used within the philosophy of religion. So how have these medieval arguments been extended in more recent times? In what follows, we shall look briefly at some modern restatements.

The Kalam Argument

The argument that we shall refer to as the kalam argument derives its name from an Arabic school of philosophy which flourished in the early Middle Ages. The mutakallimun (as the practitioners of the kalam approach were known) developed an argument for the existence of God which stressed the importance of causality. Some scholars regard this as a variant of the cosmological argument, already set out above. However, others regard it as having distinct features, meriting its treatment as an independent and distinct approach. The basic structure of the kalam argument can be set out as four propositions:

1. Everything which has a beginning must have a cause.
2. The universe began to exist.
3. Therefore, the beginning of the existence of the universe must have been caused by something.
4. The only such cause can be God.

The structure of the argument is clear, and its implications need little in the way of further development. If the existence of something can be said to have begun, it follows – so it is argued – that it must have a cause. If this type of argument is linked with the idea of a Big Bang, its relevance for our discussion will be clear. Modern cosmology strongly suggests that the universe had a beginning. If the universe began to exist at a certain time, it must have had a cause. And what cause could there be other than God? Readers will note that there are some parallels between the basic contours of this argument and Aquinas's “Five Ways,” as discussed above.

This form of the kalam argument has been widely debated in recent years. One of its most significant defenders has been William Lane Craig (born 1949), who set out its main features as follows:

Since everything that begins to exist has a cause of its existence, and since the universe began to exist, we conclude, therefore, the universe has a cause of its existence. [...] Transcending the entire universe there exists a cause which has brought the universe into being.

Debate over the argument has centered on three questions:

1. Can something have a beginning without being caused? In one of his dialogues, David Hume (1711–76) argues that it is possible to conceive of something that comes into being, without necessarily pointing to some definite cause of that existence. Nevertheless, this suggestion raises considerable difficulties.
2. Can one speak of the universe having a beginning? At one level, this is a profoundly philosophical question. At another, however, it is a scientific question, depending on issues of physics and astronomy, which can be considered on the basis of known observations concerning the rate of expansion of the universe and the background radiation evidence for the Big Bang.
3. If the universe can be considered to have been “caused,” can this cause be directly identified with God? One line of argument of note here takes the following form. A cause must be prior to the event which it causes. To speak of a cause of the beginning of the existence of the universe is thus to speak of something which existed before the universe. And if this is not God, what is it?

It will be clear that the traditional kalam argument has been given a new lease of life by the Big Bang theory of the origins of the universe, which became of especial importance in the late twentieth century. However, the philosophical issues which are raised are likely to remain disputed. A similar debate focuses on the question of whether the universe can be said to be “designed,” and we shall consider this issue in what follows.

A Classic Argument From Design: William Paley (1743–1805)

The “argument from design” – also known as the “teleological argument” – is among the most widely discussed of the philosophical arguments for the existence of God. As we saw above, it is stated by Thomas Aquinas as the fifth of his “Five Ways.” Aquinas argues that there exist clear signs of design within the natural order. Things do not simply exist; they appear to have been designed with some form of purpose in mind. The term “teleological” (meaning “directed toward some goal”) is widely used to indicate this apparently goal-directed aspect of nature.

It is this aspect of nature that has often been discussed in relation to the natural sciences. The orderliness of nature – evident, for example, in the laws of nature – seems to be a sign that nature has been “designed” for some purpose. How else, it is argued, can this order be explained? It is for this reason that naturalist approaches to science, especially those that argue that matter possesses an intrinsic capacity to organize itself, are seen as such a threat by some modern Christian apologists.

It is widely agreed that the most significant contribution to the classic “argument from design” comes from the English theologian and natural philosopher William Paley (1743–1805). His Natural Theology; or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity, Collected from the Appearances of Nature (1802) had a profound influence on popular English religious thought in the first half of the nineteenth century, and is known to have been read by Charles Darwin. Paley was deeply impressed by the discovery by Sir Isaac Newton (1643–1727) of the regularity of nature, especially in relation to the area usually known as “celestial mechanics.” It was clear that the entire universe could be thought of as a complex mechanism, operating according to regular and understandable principles. For Paley, the Newtonian image of the world as a mechanism immediately suggested the metaphor of a clock or watch, raising the question of who constructed the intricate mechanism which was so evidently displayed in the functioning of the world.

One of Paley's most significant arguments is that mechanism implies "contrivance." Writing against the backdrop of the emerging Industrial Revolution, Paley sought to exploit the apologetic potential of the growing interest in machinery – such as "watches, telescopes, stocking-mills, steam engines" – within England's literate classes. Paley argues that only someone who is mad would suggest that such complex mechanical technology came into being by purposeless chance.

Mechanism presupposes contrivance – that is to say, a sense of purpose and an ability to design and fabricate. Both the human body in particular and the world in general are to be seen as mechanisms which have been designed and constructed in such a manner as to achieve harmony of both means and ends. The world, Paley argues, may therefore be compared to a watch – to something that has clearly been constructed with a specific purpose in mind.

The opening paragraphs of Paley's Natural Theology are well known, mainly on account of their image of God as creator. God is a watchmaker; nature is a watch.

In crossing a heath, suppose I pitched my foot against a stone, and were asked how the stone came to be there. I might possibly answer, that for any thing I knew to the contrary it had lain there for ever; nor would it, perhaps, be very easy to show the absurdity of this answer. But suppose I had found a watch upon the ground, and it should be inquired how the watch happened to be in that place. I should hardly think of the answer which I had before given, that for any thing I knew the watch might have always been there. Yet why should this answer not serve for the watch as well as for the stone; why is it not admissible in the second case as in the first? For this reason, and for no other, namely, that when we come to inspect the watch, we perceive – what we could not discover in the stone – that its several parts are framed and put together for a purpose, e.g. that they are so formed and adjusted as to produce motion, and that motion so regulated as to point out the hour of the day; that if the different parts had been differently shaped from what they are, or placed after any other manner or in any other order than that in which they are placed, either no motion at all would have been carried on in the machine, or none which would have answered the use that is now served by it.

Paley then offers a detailed description of the watch, noting in particular its container, coiled cylindrical spring, many interlocking wheels, and glass face. Having carried his readers along with this careful analysis, Paley turns to draw his critically important conclusion:

This mechanism being observed – it requires indeed an examination of the instrument, and perhaps some previous knowledge of the subject, to perceive and understand it; but being once, as we have said, observed and understood, the inference we think is inevitable, that the watch must have had a maker – that there must have existed, at some time and at some place or other, an artificer or artificers who formed it for the purpose which we find it actually to answer, who comprehended its construction and designed its use.

Paley's English prose is a little florid, reflecting the taste of the period. Nevertheless, the points that he is concerned to establish are clear. Most of Paley's imagery and analogies are borrowed from English academic writers of the late seventeenth or eighteenth centuries, including the famous image of the watch. Nevertheless, Paley succeeded in giving the argument and its associated images a high popular profile.

The essential point of Paley's argument is that nature includes a series of biological structures which are “contrived” – that is, constructed with a clear purpose in mind. “Every indication of contrivance, every manifestation of design, which existed in the watch, exists in the works of nature.” Indeed, Paley argues, the difference is that nature shows an even greater degree of contrivance than the watch.

Paley had an immense influence upon popular English attitudes to arguments for God's existence based on nature. The celebrated Bridgewater Treatises (1833–40) show his influence at many points, even if they develop an independent and rather more sophisticated approach at others. The noted antitheistic evolutionary biologist Richard Dawkins (born 1941) pays Paley a somewhat backhanded compliment in the title of one of his best-known antiteleological works, The Blind Watchmaker (1986). For Dawkins, the “watchmaker” whom Paley identified with God was none other than the blind and purposeless process of natural selection.

The concept of an “argument from design” had been subjected to criticism in the eighteenth century on a number of grounds by David Hume. The most significant of Hume's criticisms can be summarized as follows.

1. The direct extrapolation from the observation of design in the world to a God who created that world is not possible. It is one thing to suggest that the observation of design leads to the inference that there is a design-producing being; it is quite another to insist that this being is none other than God. There is thus a logical weak link in the chain of argument.

2. To suggest that there is a designer of the universe could lead to an infinite regression. Who designed the designer? We noted that Aquinas explicitly rejected the idea of an infinite regression of causes; however, he fails to offer a rigorous justification of this point, apparently assuming that his readers will regard his rejection of this series as being self-evidently correct. Hume's point is that this is not the case.
3. The argument from design works by analogy with machines. The argument gains its plausibility by a comparison with something that has clearly been designed and constructed – such as a watch. But is this analogy valid? Why could the universe not be compared to a plant, or some other living organism? Plants are not designed; they just grow. The importance of this point in relation to Paley's argument will be obvious.

Having considered something of the classic arguments for God's existence, we must now move on to consider another classic theological debate: the nature of theological language. Can human words refer meaningfully to God?

The Nature of Theological Language

Theology is “talk about God.” But how can God ever be described or discussed using human language? Ludwig Wittgenstein made this point forcefully: if human words are incapable of describing the distinctive aroma of coffee, how could they possibly cope with something as subtle as God?

Does Theological Language Refer to Anything?

One of the more interesting debates in theology during the past two centuries has concerned whether theological language refers to anything – such as an external reality that we designate “God.” Most Christian theologians have adopted what we might term a “realist” position, holding that there is an external referent for theological language. For example, Thomas F. Torrance developed a rigorous form of theological realism, insisting that theology gives an account of the reality of things. “Theology and every scientific inquiry operate with the correlation of the intelligible and the intelligent.”

Similarly, Alister McGrath (the author of this book) argues intellectual disciplines or sciences are under an intrinsic obligation to give an account of reality according to its distinct nature. Theology is an attempt to represent the distinct nature and character of God, while being mindful of the limited ability of human language and ideas to do justice to God.

A distinction is often drawn between a “naïve realism,” which holds that reality impacts directly upon the human mind, without any reflection on the part of the human knower, and a “critical realism,” which recognizes that the human mind attempts to express and accommodate that reality as best it can with the tools at its disposal – such as mathematical formulae or mental models.

The key feature of a “critical realism” is its recognition that the human mind is active in the process of perception. Far from being a passive recipient of knowledge of the external world, it actively constructs this knowledge using “mental maps.” The New Testament scholar N. T. Wright (born 1948) adopts such a “critical realist” approach, which he describes as:

a way of describing the process of “knowing” that acknowledges the reality of the thing known, as something other than the knower (hence “realism”), while also fully acknowledging that the only access we have to this reality lies along the spiralling path of appropriate dialogue or conversation between the knower and the thing known (hence “critical”).

This position does not pose a challenge to the notion that there exists a world independent of the observer. It is to acknowledge that the knower is involved in the process of knowing, and that this involvement must somehow be expressed within a realist perspective on the world.

Others, however, take the view that religious language does not refer to God and is best seen as describing human experience or ideals. Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72) argued that human beings construct the idea of God, so that religious language refers primarily to our ideas about God, but not to any independent reality called God.

Non-realism is well represented by the radical Anglican philosopher of religion Don Cupitt (born 1934), who argues we must “abandon ideas of objective and eternal truth, and instead see all truth as a human improvisation.” Instead of responding to reality, we create whatever we choose to regard as real. Reality is something which we construct, not something to which we respond. “We constructed all the world-views, we made all the theories. [...] They depend on us, not we on them.”

Apophatic and Kataphatic Approaches

A classic debate in Christian theology concerns what may be said about God. This debate is often framed in terms of apophatic and kataphatic approaches to theology. Each of these terms needs explanation.

- The term “apophatic” comes from the Greek word apophatikos, meaning “negative,” which is derived from the verb “to say no” or “to deny.” It denotes an approach to theology which stresses that we cannot use human language to refer to God, who ultimately lies beyond such language. It is sometimes also referred to as the via negativa (“negative way”).
- The term “kataphatic” (sometimes spelled “cataphatic”) comes from the Greek word kataphatikos, meaning “positive,” derived from the verb “to say yes” or “to affirm.” It denotes an approach to theology which holds that positive statements may indeed be made about God. It is sometimes also referred to as the via positiva (“positive way”).

While generalizations are dangerous, the apophatic approach tends to be found in eastern Orthodoxy, whereas the western theological tradition has tended to be much more kataphatic.

The point at issue is difficult, but important. The western approach is easier to understand. Writers such as Thomas Aquinas argue that it is possible to make positive, affirmative statements about God, such as the following:

- God exists.
- God is wise.
- God is Father.

God is here described in positive terms. For example, in describing God as Father, Aquinas argues that Christian theology is recognizing that we are able to speak meaningfully about God using human language. While Aquinas is careful to stress the limits of such language, he nevertheless insists that, following the use of the Bible and the Christian tradition, we are justified in making such positive statements in terms of ideas and images that are familiar and accessible to the human mind. Theological reflection is thus based on considering these ideas and images, and extracting as much understanding from them as possible through the proper use of human reason.

Apophatic theology, in contrast, argues that the limitations placed upon human language are such that it can never do justice to God, and runs the risk of reducing God to the level of humanity. The Cappadocian fathers are often cited as representative of this tradition. For example, Basil of Caesarea remarks, in speaking of God:

I know that God exists. Yet I consider his essence to be beyond intelligence. [...] The object of our worship is not that of which we comprehend the essence, but of which we comprehend that the essence exists.

The point that Basil is making is that, while we can indeed say that God exists, human language is totally unable to comprehend God's nature. It does not have the capacity to enfold God. It is impossible for human reason to grasp the nature of God, even though it can handle the somewhat less demanding insight that God exists.

The two approaches have their respective strengths and weaknesses, and we may note a few in bringing this section to a close. The kataphatic approach allows us to say positive things about God – for example, that “God is love.” This is helpful in explaining the basics of Christianity to those outside the church. However, it runs the risk of reducing God to the level of human love, while God is clearly far more than can be conveyed by this human term. The apophatic approach preserves the mystery of God through its emphasis on the limitations of language. However, many find its principled refusal to make positive statements frustrating because it implies that we are doomed to remain ignorant of even the most basic knowledge of what God is like. The debate continues today.

In what follows, we shall focus on the kataphatic tradition and ask how it calibrates its language about God to avoid the potential problems identified by exponents of the apophatic approach.

Analogy

How can we speak meaningfully and positively about God? How can we use human language to speak about God, without reducing God to the human level? Perhaps the most basic idea which underlies the theological reply to such questions is usually referred to as “the principle of analogy.” The fact that God created the world points to a fundamental “analogy of being” (Latin: analogia entis) between God and the world. There is a continuity between God and the world on account of the expression of the being of God in the being of the world.

For this reason, Aquinas argues that it is legitimate to use entities within the created order as analogies for God, provided the limits of the approach are understood and acknowledged. By doing this, theology does not reduce God to the level of a created object or being; it merely affirms that there is a likeness or correspondence between God and that being which allows the latter to act as a signpost to God. A created entity can be like God, without being identical to God.

Consider the statement “God is our father.” Aquinas argues that this should be understood to mean that God is like a human father. In other words, God is analogous to a father. In some ways, God is like a human father, and in others not. There are genuine points of similarity. God cares for us, as human fathers care for their children (note Matthew 7: 9–11). God is the ultimate source of our existence, just as our fathers brought us into being. God exercises authority over us, as do human fathers. Equally, there are genuine points of dissimilarity. God is not a human being, for example. Nor does the necessity of a human mother point to the need for a divine mother – that is, two gods.

Aquinas argues that divine revelation makes use of images and ideas which tie in with our world of everyday existence yet which do not reduce God to that everyday world. To say that “God is our father” is not to say that God is just yet another human father. Nor, as we shall later explore, does it mean that God is to be thought of as male (see pp. 175–7). Rather, it is to say that thinking about human fathers helps us to think about God. They are analogies. Like all analogies, they break down at points. However, they are still extremely useful and vivid ways of thinking about God, which allow us to use the vocabulary and images of our own world to describe something which ultimately lies beyond it.

In saying that “God is love,” we are referring to our own capacity to love, in order to try to imagine this love in all its full perfection in God. We are not reducing the “love of God” to the level of human love. Rather, it is being suggested that human love provides a pointer toward the love of God, which, to some limited extent, it is capable of mirroring.

But, as we all know from experience, analogies break down. There comes a point when they cannot be pressed further. There are two major problems that have to be confronted here. First, and most obviously, we might mistakenly assume that an analogy is actually an identity. Instead of thinking that “God is like a rock” – to pick up on one of the Old Testament's favorite analogies (see Psalms 28: 1; 31: 2–3) – we mistakenly think that God is a rock. This fails to take account of the way in which human language struggles to represent the divine. This is one of the reasons why Aquinas shrewdly commented that “mistakes about creatures lead to mistaken knowledge about God.” If we misunderstand an analogy, we end up by misunderstanding God as well.

So how do we know when analogies break down? When we have pressed them too far? To illustrate this problem, we may consider an example from another area of theology, before moving on to consider its solution. The New Testament talks about Jesus giving his life as a “ransom” for sinners (Mark 10: 45; 1 Timothy 2: 6). What does this analogy mean? The everyday use of the word “ransom” suggests three ideas:

1. Liberation. A ransom is something which achieves freedom for a person who is held in captivity. When someone is kidnapped, and a ransom demanded, the payment of that ransom leads to liberation.
2. Payment. A ransom is a sum of money which is paid in order to achieve an individual's liberation.
3. Someone to whom the ransom is paid. A ransom is usually paid to an individual's captor, or an intermediary.

These three ideas thus seem to be implied by speaking of Jesus's death as a “ransom” for sinners. But are they all present in Scripture? There is no doubt whatsoever that the New Testament proclaims that we have been liberated from captivity through the death and resurrection of Jesus. We have been set free from captivity to sin and to the fear of death (Romans 8: 21; Hebrews 2: 15). It is also clear that the New Testament understands the death of Jesus as the price that had to be paid to achieve our liberation (1 Corinthians 6: 20; 7: 23). Our liberation is a costly and precious matter. In these two respects, the scriptural use of “redemption” corresponds to the everyday use of the word. But what of the third aspect?

There is not a hint in the New Testament that Jesus's death was the price paid to some specific person or spiritual force (such as the devil) to achieve our liberation. Some of the writers of the first four centuries, however, assumed that they could press this analogy to its limits, and declared that God had delivered us from the power of the devil by offering Jesus as the price of our liberation (see pp. 255–7). This idea surfaces repeatedly in patristic discussions of the meaning of the death of Christ. Yet it needs to be asked whether it rests upon pressing an analogy beyond its acceptable limits.

So how do we know whether an analogy has been pressed too far? How can the limits of such analogies be tested? Such questions have been debated throughout Christian history. An important twentieth-century discussion of this point may be found in British philosopher of religion Ian T. Ramsey's (1915–72) Christian Discourse: Some Logical Explorations (1965), which puts forward the idea that models or analogies are not freestanding but interact with and qualify each other.

Ramsey argues that Scripture does not give us one single analogy (or “model”) of God or of salvation, but uses a range of analogies. Each of these analogies or models illuminates certain aspects of our understanding of God, or the nature of salvation. However, these analogies also interact with each other. They modify each other. They help us understand the limits of other analogies. No analogy or parable is exhaustive in itself; taken together, however, the range of analogies and parables builds up to give a comprehensive and consistent understanding of God and salvation.

An example of how images interact may make this point clearer. Take the analogies of king, father, and shepherd. Each of these three analogies conveys the idea of authority, suggesting that this is of fundamental importance to our understanding of God. Kings, however, often behave in arbitrary ways, and not always in the best interests of their subjects. The analogy of God as a king might thus be misunderstood to suggest that God is some sort of tyrant. However, the tender compassion of a father toward his children commended by Scripture (Psalm 103: 13–18), and the total dedication of a good shepherd to the welfare of his flock (John 10: 11), show that this is not the intended meaning. Authority is to be exercised tenderly and wisely.

Aquinas's doctrine of analogy, then, is of fundamental importance to the way we think about God. It illuminates the manner in which God reveals himself to us through scriptural images and analogies, allowing us to understand how God can be above our world and yet simultaneously be revealed in and through that world. God is not an object or a person in space and time; nevertheless, such persons and objects can help us deepen our appreciation of God's character and nature. God, who is infinite, may be revealed in and through human words and finite images.

Metaphor

The precise nature of the differences between analogies and metaphors remains disputed. Aristotle defined a metaphor as involving “the transferred use of a term that properly belongs to something else.” So broad is this definition that it embraces just about every figure of speech, including analogy. In modern use, the word “metaphor” would be taken to mean something rather different, with the following being a useful definition. A metaphor is a way of speaking about one thing in terms which are suggestive of another. It is, to use Nelson Goodman's (1906–98) famous phrase, “a matter of teaching an old word new tricks.” This definition clearly includes analogy; so what is the difference between them?

Once more, it is necessary to note that there is no general agreement on this matter. Individual writers offer their own definitions, often reflecting their personal agendas. Perhaps a working solution to the problem could be stated as follows: analogies seem to be appropriate, where metaphors involve a sense of surprise or initial incredulity. For example, consider these two statements:

1. God is wise.
2. God is a lion.

In the first case, it is being affirmed that there is an analogical connection between the nature of God and the human notion of “wisdom.” It is being suggested that, at both the linguistic and the ontological level, there is a direct parallel between human and divine notions of wisdom. Human wisdom serves as an analogy of divine wisdom. The comparison does not cause us any surprise.

In the second case, the comparison can cause a slight degree of consternation. It does not seem to be appropriate to compare God to a lion. However many similarities there may be between God and a lion, there are obviously many differences. For some modern writers, a metaphor mingles similarity and dissimilarity, stressing that there are both parallels and divergences between the two objects being compared.

With these points in mind, we may explore three features of metaphors which have attracted theological attention in recent decades.

First, metaphors imply both similarity and dissimilarity between the two things being compared. It is perhaps for this reason that some recent writings – particularly those of Sallie McFague (born 1933) – have stressed the metaphorical, rather than the analogical, nature of theological language. As McFague puts it:

Metaphor always has the character of “is” and “is not”: an assertion is made but as a likely account rather than a definition. That is, to say, “God is mother,” is not to define God as mother, nor to assert identity between the terms “God” and “mother,” but to suggest that we consider what we do not know how to talk about – relating to God – through the metaphor of mother. The assumption here is that all talk of God is indirect: no words or phrases refer directly to God, for God-language can refer only through the detour of a description that properly belongs elsewhere. To speak of God as mother is to invite us to consider some qualities associated with mothering as one partial but perhaps illuminating way of speaking of certain aspects of God's relationship to us.

To speak of “God as father” should be seen as a metaphor, rather than an analogy, implying significant differences between God and a father, rather than (as in the case of an analogy) a direct line of similarities.

Second, metaphors cannot be reduced to definitive statements. Perhaps the most attractive feature of metaphors for Christian theology is their open-ended character. Although some literary critics have suggested that metaphors can be reduced to a set of equivalent literal expressions, others have insisted that no limits can be set to the extent of the comparison. Thus, the metaphor “God as father” cannot be reduced to a set of precise statements about God, valid for every place and every time. It is meant to be suggestive, allowing future readers and interpreters to find new meanings within it. A metaphor is not simply an elegant description or memorable phrasing of something that we already know. It is an invitation to discover further levels of meaning which others may have overlooked or forgotten.

Third, metaphors often have strongly emotional overtones. Theological metaphors are able to express the emotional dimensions of Christian faith in a way that makes them appropriate to worship. For example, the metaphor of “God as light” has enormously powerful overtones, including those of illumination, purity, and glorification. Ian G. Barbour (1923–2013), in his Myths, Models and Paradigms (1974), summarizes this aspect of metaphorical language as follows:

Where poetic metaphors are used only momentarily, in one context, for the sake of an immediate expression or insight, religious symbols become part of the language of a religious community in its scripture and liturgy and in its continuing life and thought. Religious symbols are expressive of human emotions and feelings, and are powerful in calling forth response and commitment.

Accommodation

A third approach declines to speculate on the precise nature of theological language, and instead focuses on the general principles which seem to underlie the use of theological language. The basic ideas of the approach we propose to consider derive from classical Greek rhetorical theory, taken up with enthusiasm by patristic writers such as Origen (c.185–c.254). Origen suggests that God faced much the same problems in addressing sinful humanity as those experienced by a human father in trying to communicate to small children. “God condescends and comes down to us, accommodating to our weakness, like a schoolmaster talking a ‘little language’ to his children, or like a father caring for his own children and adopting their ways.” When talking to small children, Origen argues, speakers need to appreciate that those children have limited intellectual resources at their disposal. Treating children as adults, using words and ideas that are beyond their understanding and experience, leads to a failure to communicate with them. Their capacities must be respected.

This approach was taken up in the sixteenth century by John Calvin (1509–64), who developed the theory usually referred to by the term “accommodation.” The word “accommodation” here means “adjusting or adapting to meet the needs of the situation and the human ability to comprehend it.” In revelation, Calvin argues, God accommodates to the capacities of the human mind and heart. God paints a self-portrait which we are capable of understanding. The analogy which lies behind Calvin's thinking at this point is that of a human orator. Good speakers know the limitations of their audience, and adjust the way they speak accordingly. The gulf between the speaker and the hearer must be bridged if communication is to take place. God has to come down to our level in the process of revelation. Just as a human mother stoops down to reach her child, so God stoops down to come to our level.

An example of this accommodation is provided by the scriptural portraits of God. God is often, Calvin points out, represented as possessing a mouth, eyes, hands, and feet. That might seem to suggest that God is a human being. It might seem to imply that somehow the eternal and spiritual God has been reduced to a physical human being. (The point at issue is often referred to as “anthropomorphism” – in other words, God being portrayed in human form.) Calvin argues that God is obliged to configure the divine self-revelation in this pictorial manner on account of our weak intellects. Images of God which represent God as having a mouth or hands are divine “baby talk,” a way in which God comes down to our level and uses images which we can handle. More sophisticated ways of speaking about God are certainly proper, but we might not be able to understand them.

Calvin's concern was not to generalize about the nature of theological language – whether it is analogical or metaphorical, or any of the other figures of speech with which he was familiar. His basic concern was to stress that theological language cannot necessarily be taken at face value. The theologian has to decide on the nature and extent of that accommodation. It is this principle that underlies Calvin's response to a major controversy in which the status of theological language proved to be of decisive importance: the Copernican theory of the solar system. So important is this case study that it deserves to be considered in some detail, to illustrate the application of the ideas we have just been dealing with.

A Case Study: The Copernican Debate

One of the most significant confrontations between theology and the natural sciences took place during the sixteenth century, with the publication of Nicolaus Copernicus's (1473–1543) heliocentric theory of the solar system. Up to that point, the generally accepted understanding was geocentric: the sun and every other heavenly body revolved around the earth. After all, even the Bible referred to the motion of the sun.

In his On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Bodies (1543), Copernicus argued that the earth revolved around the sun. With the publication of Copernicus's theory, a radical challenge was posed to the received view – and also to the accepted way of interpreting the Bible. As the scientific merits of Copernicus's theory became apparent, a new threat seemed to be posed to the authority and reliability of the Bible. How could Copernicus's heliocentric theory be reconciled with the Bible's apparently geocentric outlook? There are excellent reasons for suggesting that Calvin's theological method may have been of decisive importance, both in gaining a sympathetic hearing for Copernicus's theory of the solar system and in preserving the credibility of the Bible.

Calvin may be regarded as making two major contributions to the appreciation and development of the natural sciences. First, he positively encouraged the scientific study of nature; second, he eliminated a major obstacle to the development of that study. His first contribution is specifically linked with his stress upon the orderliness of creation; both the physical world and the human body testify to the wisdom and character of God. Calvin thus commends the study of both astronomy and medicine. They are able to probe more deeply than theology into the natural world, and thus uncover further evidence of the orderliness of creation and the wisdom of its creator.

Calvin thus gave a new religious motivation to the scientific investigation of nature, which came to be seen as a means of perceiving the wise hand of God in creation. God can thus be discerned through the detailed study of creation. We have already noted the importance of natural theology within the Reformed tradition

(pp. 143–4); there is ample evidence to suggest that an interest in natural theology went hand in hand with an interest in the natural sciences.

Such ideas were taken up with enthusiasm within the Royal Society, the most significant organization devoted to the advancement of scientific research and learning in England. Many of its early members were admirers of Calvin, familiar with his writings and their potential relevance to their fields of study. Thus, Richard Bentley (1662–1742) delivered a series of lectures in 1692, based on Newton's Principia mathematica (1687), in which the regularity of the universe, as established by Newton, is interpreted as evidence of design. There are unambiguous hints here of Calvin's reference to the universe as a “theater of the glory of God,” in which humans are an appreciative audience. The detailed study of creation leads to an increased awareness of the wisdom of its creator.

It is Calvin's second major contribution which is of especial interest to us here. Calvin is widely regarded as having eliminated a significant obstacle to the development of the natural sciences: biblical literalism, which remains influential within fundamentalist circles today. Calvin insisted that not all biblical statements concerning God or the world were to be taken literally, for they were accommodated to the abilities of their audiences. Scripture, in apparently speaking of the sun rotating around the earth, was simply accommodating itself to the worldview of its audience, not making scientific statements about the universe. Calvin's discussion of the relationship between scientific findings and the statements of the Bible is generally regarded as one of his most valuable contributions to Christian thought.

The impact of these ideas upon scientific theorizing, especially during the seventeenth century, was considerable. For example, the seventeenth-century English writer Edward Wright (1561–1615) defended Copernicus's heliocentric theory of the solar system against biblical literalists by arguing, in the first place, that Scripture was not concerned with physics, and, in the second, that its manner of speaking was “accommodated to the understanding and way of speech of the common people, like nurses to little children.” Both these arguments derive directly from Calvin, who may be argued to have made a fundamental contribution to the emergence of the natural sciences at these points.

We have now concluded our brief survey of some issues of method in theology. It is now time to engage directly with the leading themes of Christian theology, beginning with the Christian doctrine of God.

THE DOCTRINE OF GOD

In the first eight chapters of this book, we have been considering the historical development of Christian theology, as well as some issues of sources and methods. While questions concerning history and method will be a recurring feature of the remainder of this work, this third part of the volume is primarily devoted to questions of theological substance. We shall use the structure of the traditional Christian creeds as a framework for our exploration of the leading topics of Christian theology. As all these creeds open by declaring faith in God, we shall begin this final section by considering the Christian doctrine of God.

The present chapter will explore a range of important questions relating to the doctrine of God. Although many traditional themes will be explored, we shall also pay attention to a series of questions of particular relevance to the modern period – such as concerns raised by the rise of feminism, a new concern for the suffering of the world, and increased anxiety concerning the environment. Readers should note that two later chapters will deal with the person and work of the Holy Spirit and the distinctively Christian doctrine of the Trinity, perhaps one of the most difficult aspects of Christian theology – yet also one of the most rewarding.

We begin our discussion of the Christian doctrine of God by turning to a question of gender that has become increasingly important in western culture since the 1960s. Is God male? Indeed, can one speak of God as having a “gender” in the first place? As this question is so important to so many people, it seems a highly appropriate place to start our explorations.

Is God Male?

Both the Old and the New Testaments use male language about God. The Greek word theos is unquestionably masculine, and most of the analogies used for God throughout Scripture – such as a warrior, father, king, and shepherd – are male. Does this mean that God is male? If so, it would raise important, and difficult, questions concerning the relationship between male and female believers, as many feminist writers have correctly pointed out.

While it is true that biblical language primarily uses male analogs for God, it is important to note that this has much to do with the sociology and anthropology of ancient Israel, which led to such male analogies being given priority to represent God. Yet, even in this patriarchal cultural context, God was not understood to be sexually male. Furthermore, Israel recognized the importance of female imagery to express aspects of God's character: for example, the image of God as “giving birth” to Israel (Deuteronomy 32: 18), as a midwife who helps with the birthing process (Isaiah 66: 9–11), and as caring for Israel as a mother cares for her child (Isaiah 66: 13). It is too easily forgotten that the provision of bread was seen as a feminine action in this cultural context, and recalling this fact allows us to see God's provision of manna for Israel during the wilderness wanderings in a new light (Exodus 16: 4, 15).

There is also an important question about the status of this language for God. To put the issue succinctly: does the use of male analogs for God imply that God is male? Or the use of female analogs that God is female? In the fourth century, Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89) rejected any idea that God was male because God was referred to as Father, or that the Holy Spirit was an impersonal object because the term was grammatically neutral. The fatherhood of God, Gregory insisted, had nothing to do with sexuality or biological reproduction. Rather, it is a fundamentally relational notion. God is not a woman. God is not a man. God is God.

Earlier, we noted the analogical nature of theological language (pp. 165–7). The use of such analogies means that persons or social roles, largely drawn from the rural world of the ancient Near East, were regarded as suitable models for the divine activity or personality. One such analogy is that of a father. Yet the statement that “a father in ancient Israelite society is a suitable model for God” is not equivalent to saying that “God is a male human being” or that “God is confined to the cultural parameters of ancient Israel.” Neither male nor female sexuality is to be attributed to God, in that this sexuality is an attribute of the created order. There is no reason to suppose that such a polarity exists within the creator God.

Indeed, the Old Testament avoids attributing sexual functions to God, on account of the strongly pagan overtones of such associations. The Canaanite fertility cults emphasized the sexual functions of both gods and goddesses; the Old Testament refuses to endorse the idea that the gender or the sexuality of God is a significant matter. Wolfhart

Pannenberg (1928–2014) makes this point in his Systematic Theology (1990):

The aspect of fatherly care in particular is taken over in what the Old Testament has to say about God's fatherly care for Israel. The sexual definition of the father's role plays no part. [...] To bring sexual differentiation into the understanding of God would mean polytheism; it was thus ruled out for the God of Israel. [...] The fact that God's care for Israel can also be expressed in terms of a mother's love shows clearly enough how little there is any sense of sexual distinction in the understanding of God as Father.

In an attempt to bring out the fact that God is not male, a number of recent writers have explored the idea of God as “mother” (which brings out the female aspects of God) or as “friend” (which brings out the more gender-neutral aspects of God). An excellent example of this is provided by Sallie McFague (born 1933) in her Models of God (1987). Recognizing that speaking of “God as father” does not mean that God is male, she writes:

God as mother does not mean that God is mother (or father). We imagine God as both mother and father, but we realize how inadequate these and any other metaphors are to express the creative love of God. [...] Nevertheless, we speak of this love in language that is familiar and dear to us, the language of mothers and fathers who give us life, from whose bodies we come, and upon whose care we depend.

A similar point is made by the 1994 Catechism of the Catholic Church, which stresses the way in which parental imagery, particularly that of fatherhood, brings out central themes of the gospel:

By calling God “Father,” the language of faith indicates two main things: that God is the first origin of everything and transcendent authority; and that he is at the same time goodness and loving care for all his children. God's parental tenderness can also be expressed by the image of motherhood, which emphasizes God's immanence, the intimacy between Creator and creature. The language of faith thus draws on the human experience of parents, who are in a way the first representatives of God for man. But this experience also tells us that human parents are fallible and can disfigure the face of fatherhood and motherhood. We ought therefore to recall that God transcends the human distinction between the sexes. He is neither man nor woman; he is God. He also transcends human fatherhood and motherhood, although he is their origin and standard; no one is father as God is Father.

The new interest in the issues raised by the maleness of most of the biblical images of God has led to a careful reading of the spiritual literature of early periods in Christian history, resulting in an increased appreciation of the use of female imagery during these earlier periods. An excellent example of this is provided by the Revelations of Divine Love, an account of 16 visions which appeared to the English writer Julian of Norwich (c.1342–1416) in May 1373. The visions are notable for their distinctive tendency to refer to both God and Jesus Christ in strongly maternal terms:

I saw that God rejoices to be our Father, and also that he rejoices to be our Mother; and yet again, that he rejoices to be our true Husband, with our soul as his beloved bride. [...] He is the foundation, substance and the thing itself, what it is by nature. He is the true Father and Mother of what things are by nature.

A Personal God

Down the ages, theologians and ordinary Christian believers alike have had no hesitation in speaking about God in personal terms. For example, Christianity has ascribed to God a whole series of attributes (such as love, trustworthiness, and purpose) which have strongly personal associations. Many writers have pointed out that the Christian practice of prayer seems to be modeled on the relationship between a child and a parent. Prayer expresses a gracious relationship which “is simply trust in a person whose whole dealing with us proves him worthy of trust” (John Oman).

One of Paul's leading soteriological images, “reconciliation” (see 2 Corinthians 5: 19), is clearly modeled on human personal relationships. It implies that the transformation through faith of the relationship between God and sinful human beings is like the reconciliation of two persons – perhaps an alienated husband and wife.

There are thus powerful reasons for suggesting that the idea of a “personal God” is integral to the Christian understanding of God. But such a suggestion raises a number of difficulties that require careful consideration. The following problems are particularly important.

1. The idea of a personal God might be taken to imply that God is a human being. To speak of God as “a person” is to reduce God to our level. Tillich (1886–1965) points to “difficulties of location” in speaking of God in personal terms. To refer to God as a person is to imply that God, in common with human beings, is located at some definite place. Given the modern understanding of the universe, this assumption seems very out of place.

2. The doctrine of the Trinity speaks of God as “three persons.” To speak of God as “a person” thus amounts to a denial of the Trinity. Historically, this objection is well justified. Many writers who spoke of God as “a person” were unhappy with the idea that God was three persons. Thus, in his Philosophical Commentaries, the famous English empiricist philosopher Bishop Berkeley (1685–1753) made a note not to speak of God as “a person” for this very reason.

These difficulties can, however, be mitigated. In response to the first, it may be pointed out that talking of God as “a person” is analogical. To say that God is like a person is to affirm the divine ability and willingness to relate to others. This does not imply that God is human, or located at a specific point in the universe. All analogies break down at some point. These aspects of the analogy are not intended to be taken up.

In response to the trinitarian difficulty, it will be noticed that the word “person” has changed its meaning significantly over the centuries. The word “person” does not have the same meaning in the two sentences which follow:

- God is three persons.
- God is a person.

We shall explore this point further in Chapter 13, which deals in more detail with the grounds and nature of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity itself (see pp. 299–326). Our attention now turns to further exploration of the term “person.”

Defining “Person”

In everyday language the word “person” has come to mean little more than “an individual human being.” Yet there is greater depth to the idea of a “person” than a solitary individual. To understand why Christian theologians have placed so much emphasis on the idea of a personal God, we need to explore in greater detail what it means to speak of persons.

The word “person” derives from the Latin term persona, which originally had the sense of a “mask.” There may be an etymological connection between this Latin word and the Etruscan word for the goddess Persephone. (Etruscan was the language of a region of ancient Italy near Rome.) Masks were worn by those participating in her festivals, which tended, by all reports, to degenerate into orgies. By the time of Cicero (106–43 bc), the word had acquired a range of meanings. Although the sense of “mask” still predominated, important overtones had developed. Masks were used much in Roman theaters, being worn by actors to indicate the parts those actors were playing in dramas. Persona thus came to mean both “a theatrical mask” and “a theatrical character” or “a role in a play.”

This idea was picked up by the Latin-speaking theologian Tertullian (c.160–c.220), who was active in the third century. Tertullian saw how this idea could be used to help communicate some aspects of the Christian idea of God within Roman culture. A person was a being who speaks and acts. For early Christian writers, the word “person” is an expression of the individuality of a human being, as seen in his or her words, actions, and especially social relationships. A person is someone who plays a role in a social drama, who relates to others. A person has a part to play within a network of social relationships.

“Individuality” does not imply social relationships, whereas “personality” relates to the part played by an individual in a web of relationships, by which that person is perceived to be distinctive by others. The basic idea expressed by the concept of “a personal God” is thus a God with whom we can stand in a relationship which is analogous to that which we could have with another human person.

It is helpful to consider what overtones the phrase “an impersonal God” would convey. The phrase suggests a God who is distant or aloof, who deals with humanity (if God deals with us at all) in general terms which take no account of human individuality. The idea of a personal relationship, such as love, suggests a reciprocal character to God's dealings with us. This idea is incorporated into the notion of a personal God, but not into impersonal conceptions of the nature of God. There are strongly negative overtones to the idea of "impersonal" that have passed into Christian thinking about the nature of God.

This point can be more fully appreciated by considering the impersonal concepts of God associated with the classical Greek philosopher Aristotle and the seventeenth-century philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–77). The English philosopher of religion C. C. J. Webb (1865–1954) pointed out the limitations of Aristotle's notion of God as follows:

Aristotle does not and could not speak of a love of God for us in any sense. God, according to the principles of Aristotle's theology, can know and love nothing less than himself. [...] He is utterly transcendent, and beyond the reach of personal communion. It is very instructive to study the modifications which Aristotle's faithful follower, St. Thomas Aquinas, has to introduce into his master's notion of God, in order to make room for the providence of God for man, and the communion of man with God which his religious faith and religious experience demanded.

Spinoza experienced the same difficulty in constructing his rationalist notion of God. He affirmed that human beings should love God, yet he could not see how this love could be in any way reciprocated by God. It is a one-way street. Spinoza did not permit the two-way relationship implied by a personal God who loves, and is loved by, individual human beings. For Spinoza, any passion on the part of God involves a change in his being. Either he moves to a greater perfection or to a lesser. In either case, the perfection of God is compromised, in that God either becomes more perfect (in which case, God was not perfect to start with) or less perfect (in which case, suffering leads to God ceasing to be perfect). As a result, Spinoza argues, it is not possible to speak of God loving anyone, as this proves to be inconsistent with the idea of a perfect God. This point is made clearly in his Ethics (1677):

Proposition 17. God is without passions, nor is God affected with any experience of joy or sadness. Demonstration. All ideas, in so far as they have reference to God, are true, that is, they are adequate: and therefore God is without passions. Again, God cannot pass to a higher or a lower perfection: and therefore God is affected with no emotion of joy or sadness. Q.E.D.

Corollary: God, strictly speaking, loves no one nor hates anyone. For God is affected with no emotion of joy or sadness, and consequently loves no one nor hates anyone.

So what does it mean to be a “person”? Our attention now turns to a modern philosophical analysis of the idea of a “person” which is of considerable interest to Christian theology.

Dialogical Personalism: Martin Buber (1878–1965)

In each earlier chapter, we introduced the idea of the ancilla theologiae – the theological use of philosophy to clarify or illustrate some of theology’s core themes. Many twentieth-century theologians appealed to the philosophical movement known as “dialogical personalism” to help clarify what it meant to speak of God as a person. One of the leading representatives of this movement was the Jewish writer Martin Buber.

In his major work I and You (1927; the German original is Ich und Du, which is often translated as “I and Thou” to bring out the fact that the “you” is the singular, familiar form), Buber drew a fundamental distinction between two categories of relations: “I–You” relations, which are “personal,” and “I–It” relations, which are impersonal. We shall explore these basic distinctions further, before considering their theological importance.

- I–It relations: Buber uses this category to refer to the relationship between subjects and objects – for example, between a human being and a pencil. The human being is active, whereas the pencil is passive. This distinction is often referred to in more philosophical language as a subject–object relationship, in which an active subject (in this case, the human being) relates to an inactive object (in this case, the pencil). According to Buber, the subject acts as an I and the object as an It. The relationship between the human being and the pencil could thus be described as an I–It relationship.

- I–You relations: At this point, we come to the heart of Buber's philosophy. An I–You relationship exists between two active subjects, between two persons. It is something which is mutual and reciprocal. “The I of the primary word I–You makes its appearance as a person, and becomes conscious of itself.” In other words, Buber is suggesting that human personal relationships exemplify the essential features of an I–You relationship. It is the relationship itself, that intangible and invisible bond that links two persons, which is the heart of Buber's idea of an I–You relationship.

I–It knowledge is indirect, is mediated through an object, and has specific content. In contrast, I–You knowledge is direct, is immediate, and lacks specific content. An It is known by measurable parameters – its height, weight, color, and so on. We can give a good physical description of it. But a You is known directly. The English language allows a distinction to be made between “knowing about something” and “knowing someone.” Roughly the same distinction lies behind Buber's categories of I–It and I–You relationships. We know about an It – but we know, and are known by, a You. To “know about” something is to be able to express the content of that knowledge. Yet, strictly speaking, there is no content to “knowing someone.” The particular form of “knowledge” in question is relational, and thus cannot really be expressed in informational ways.

For Buber, an I–You relationship is thus mutual, reciprocal, symmetrical, and contentless. Both partners retain their own subjectivity in the encounter, in which they become aware of the other person as a subject, rather than an object. Whereas an I–It relationship can be thought of as the active subject pursuing and investigating the passive object, an I–You relationship involves the encounter of two mutually active subjects. It is the relationship – something which has no real content, but which really exists nonetheless – that is the real focus of personal interaction. It is, to use Buber's terms, “not a specific content, but a Presence, a Presence as power.”

Buber thus draws a distinction between the worlds of experience and relationship. In particular, Buber stresses the importance of reciprocity in an I–You relationship, which is direct and unmediated:

The You encounters me by grace – it cannot be found by seeking. But that I speak the basic word to it is a deed of my whole being, is my essential deed. The You encounters me. But I enter into a direct relationship to it. Thus the relationship is election and electing, passive and active at once. [...] The relation to the You is unmediated. Nothing conceptual intervenes between I and You.

What, then, are the theological implications of this approach to personhood? How does Buber's philosophy help us to understand and explore the idea of God as a person? A number of points should be noted, all of which have important and helpful theological applications. Buber noted some of these himself, especially in the final sections of I and You, in which he explored the implications of his approach to thinking and speaking about God – or, to use his preferred term, “the Absolute You.”

1. Buber's approach affirms that God cannot be reduced to a concept, or to some neat conceptual formulation. According to Buber, only an It can be treated in this way. For Buber, God is the “You who can, by its nature, never become an It. That is, God is a being who escapes all attempts at objectification and transcends all description.” Theology must learn to acknowledge and wrestle with the presence of God, realizing that this presence cannot be reduced to a neat package of content.

2. The approach allows valuable insights into the idea of revelation (see pp. 136–41). For Christian theology, God's revelation is not simply a making known of facts about God, but a self-revelation of God. Revelation of ideas about God is to be supplemented by revelation of God as a person, a presence as much as content. Revelation thus includes knowledge of God as an It and as a You. We come to know things about God, yet we also come to know God. Similarly, “knowledge of God” includes knowledge of God as both It and You. Revelation is about God making it possible for human beings to know God and to know about God. Buber's framework thus makes it possible to place these ideas about revelation in a supportive and more rigorous structure.
3. Buber's “dialogical personalism” also allows criticism of the idea that God is a passive object, which is perhaps the weakest and most heavily criticized aspect of some forms of nineteenth-century liberal theology. The characteristic noninclusive nineteenth-century phrase “man's quest for God” summed up the basic premise of this approach: God is an It, a passive object, waiting to be discovered by (male) theologians, who are viewed as active subjects. Writers within the dialectical school, especially Emil Brunner (1889–1966) in his Truth as Encounter (1937), argued that God had to be viewed as a You, an active subject. As such, God could take the initiative away from humans, through self-revelation and a willingness to be known in an historical and personal form, namely Jesus Christ. Theology is thus to be thought of as a human response to God's self-disclosure, rather than the human quest for God.

This emphasis upon a “personal God” raises a number of questions, one of which concerns the extent to which human experiences can be said to be shared by God. If God is personal, one can speak of God “loving” people. But how far can this be taken? Can, for example, one speak of God “suffering”?

Can God Suffer?

Christian theology throws up many fascinating questions. Some of them are interesting in themselves. Others are interesting because they open up wider issues. A question which belongs to both of these categories is this: can God be said to suffer? If God can be said to suffer, a point of contact is immediately established between God and the pain of the human world. God cannot then be thought of as being immune from the suffering of the creation. The implications of this for reflecting upon the problem of evil and suffering would be considerable.

But the question is also of interest in another respect. It invites us to consider why so many writers have an inbuilt aversion to thinking and speaking about “a suffering God.” To explore this point, we may consider the historical background to early Christian theology. Although Christianity had its origins in Palestine, it rapidly expanded into other areas of the eastern Mediterranean world, such as modern-day Turkey and Egypt, establishing strongholds in cities such as Antioch and Alexandria. In the course of doing so, it came into contact with Hellenistic culture and Greek ways of thinking.

This naturally raises an interesting question. Did the Christian theologians who worked in this Hellenistic cultural environment inadvertently incorporate some characteristically Greek ideas into their thought? In other words, did a basically Palestinian gospel become distorted by being refracted through a Hellenistic prism? Particular attention was focused on the introduction of metaphysical terms into theology. Some scholars regarded this as the imposition of a static Greek way of thinking upon a dynamic semitic worldview. The result, they argued, was a distortion of the gospel.

Since the time of the Enlightenment, this question has been taken with considerable seriousness. A movement of major importance in this respect is known as the “history of dogma” movement (a working translation of the somewhat formidable German term Dogmengeschichte). Writers such as Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930) believed that at least some classical Greek ideas had inappropriately found their way into Christian theology. One of these, in the view of some scholars, is the idea of a God who lies beyond suffering. In what follows, we shall explore the classical pagan idea of the apatheia or “impassibility” of God – the view according to which God lies beyond all human emotions and pain.

The Classical View: The Impassibility of God

The notion of perfection dominates the classical understanding of God, as it is expressed in the Platonic dialogues, such as The Republic. To be perfect is to be unchanging and self-sufficient. It is therefore impossible for such a perfect being to be affected or changed by anything outside itself. Furthermore, perfection was understood in very static terms, as we noted when considering Spinoza's approach to divine perfection (see p. 179). If God is perfect, change in any direction is an impossibility. If God changes, this either represents a move away from perfection (in which case, God is no longer perfect) or a move toward perfection (in which case, God was not perfect in the past). Aristotle, echoing such ideas, declared that “change would be change for the worse,” and thus excluded his divine being from change and suffering.

This understanding passed into Christian theology at an early stage. Philo of Alexandria (c.25 bc–c.ad 50), a Hellenistic Jew whose writings were much admired by early Christian writers, wrote a treatise entitled That God is Unchangeable, which vigorously defended the impassibility of God. Biblical passages that seemed to speak of God suffering were, he argued, to be treated as metaphors and not to be allowed their full literal weight. To allow that God changes was to deny the divine perfection. “What greater impiety could there be than to suppose that the Unchangeable changes?” asked Philo. It seemed to be an unanswerable question.

For Philo, God could not be allowed to suffer, or undergo anything which could be spoken of as “passion.” The medieval writer Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109), influenced by this idea, argued that God was compassionate in terms of our experience, but not in terms of the divine being itself. In his Proslogion, Anselm stated that the language of love and compassion is to be treated as purely figurative when used in relation to God. We could say that we experience God as compassionate; this does not, however, mean that God is compassionate.

You are truly compassionate in terms of our experience. Yet you are not so in terms of your own. For when you see us in our misery, we experience the effect of compassion; you, however, do not experience this feeling. Therefore you are compassionate, in that you save the miserable and spare those who sin against you; and you are not compassionate, in that you are not affected by any sympathy for misery.

Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) developed a similar approach when reflecting on the love of God for sinners. Love implies vulnerability and, potentially, that God could be affected by our sorrows, or moved by our misery. Yet, while Aquinas had no difficulty in speaking about God being merciful or loving, he was clear that these referred to the being of God, not to God's experience or feelings: "Mercy is especially to be attributed to God, provided that it is considered as an effect, not as a feeling of suffering. [...] It does not belong to God to grieve over the misery of others."

Now many readers will feel that there is an obvious difficulty here. The gospels make it clear that Jesus Christ was deeply moved by the suffering of others. Furthermore, Christ himself suffered and died on the cross. Traditional Christian theology declared that Jesus Christ was God incarnate. So if Christ is God, and Christ suffered, it surely follows that God suffered in Christ. (The issue in question is the "communication of attributes," to be discussed at pp. 223–4.) Not so, declared most (though not all) patristic writers, who seem to have been decisively influenced by pagan ideas about the perfection and impassibility of God. For these writers, Christ suffered only in his human nature and not in his divine nature. God thus did not experience human suffering, and remained unaffected by this aspect of the world.

Yet, while the idea of an impassible God achieved considerable influence during the patristic and medieval periods, there were protests against these developments. Martin Luther's (1483–1546) “theology of the cross,” which emerged during the period 1518–19, speaks explicitly of a suffering and crucified God. In the Heidelberg Disputation (1518), Luther contrasted two rival ways of thinking about God. A “theology of glory” perceives God's glory, power, and wisdom in creation. A “theology of the cross” discerns God hidden in the suffering and humiliation of the cross of Christ. Luther deliberately uses the provocative and perhaps puzzling phrase “a crucified God” speaking of the manner in which God shares in the sufferings of the crucified Christ.

The English writer Charles Wesley (1707–88) also saw the incarnation as making it possible to speak of the suffering of God. In one of his hymns, Wesley uses a dramatic turn of phrase to express his belief that the incarnation brings God directly into contact with the experience of suffering and death: “Impassive He suffers; Immortal He dies.”

The Twentieth Century: A Paradigm Shift?

By the end of the twentieth century, many had concluded that there had been a paradigm shift in western theological thinking about the idea of a suffering God. What was once seen as heretical seemed to have become the new orthodoxy. So what pressures led to the rediscovery of the idea of a suffering God? Three can be identified, all focusing on the period immediately after the First World War. These three factors, taken together, gave rise to widespread skepticism concerning traditional ideas about the impassibility of God, classically expressed in the patristic idea of the divine apatheia.

The first factor was the rise of protest atheism. The sheer horror of the First World War made a deep impact upon western theological reflection. The suffering of the period led to a widespread perception that liberal Protestantism was fatally compromised by its optimistic views of human nature. It is no accident that dialectical theology arose in the aftermath of this trauma. Another significant response was the movement known as “protest atheism,” which raised a serious moral protest against belief in God. How could anyone believe in a God who was above such suffering and pain in the world?

Traces of such ideas can be found in Fyodor Dostoevsky's (1821–81) classic nineteenth-century novel The Brothers Karamazov (1880).

The ideas were developed more fully in the twentieth century, often using Dostoevsky's character Ivan Karamazov as a model.

Karamazov's rebellion against God (or, perhaps more accurately, against the idea of God) has its origins in his refusal to accept that the suffering of an innocent child could ever be justified. Albert Camus (1913–60) developed such ideas in his novel The Rebel (1951), which expressed Karamazov's protest in terms of a “metaphysical rebellion.” Jürgen Moltmann (born 1926) saw in this protest against a detached, indifferent, and invulnerable God “the only serious atheism.” This intensely moral form of atheism demanded a credible theological response – which Moltmann believed had to lie in the form of a theology of a suffering God.

The second factor was the rediscovery of Luther. In 1883 – the celebration of the 400th anniversary of Luther's birth – the Weimar edition of Luther's works was launched. The resulting availability of Luther's works (many of which were hitherto unpublished) led to a resurgence in Luther scholarship, especially in German theological circles. Scholars such as Karl Holl (1866–1926) opened the way for a new interest in the reformer during the 1920s. The result was a perceptible quickening of interest in many of Luther's ideas, especially the “theology of the cross.” Luther's ideas about a “God who is hidden in suffering” became available at almost exactly the moment when they would achieve maximum resonance with the cultural mood.

The third factor was the growing impact of the “history of dogma” movement. Although this movement reached its climax in the closing days of the nineteenth century, it took some while for the implications of its program to percolate into Christian theology as a whole. By the time the First World War had ended, there was a general awareness that numerous Greek ideas (such as the impassibility of God) had found their way into Christian theology. Sustained attention was given to eliminating these ideas. Protest atheism created a climate in which it was apologetically necessary to speak of a suffering God. The “history of dogma” movement declared that Christian thinking had taken a wrong turn in the patristic period, and that this could be successfully reversed. Christian declarations that God was above suffering, or invulnerable, were now realized to be inauthentic. It was time to recover the authentically Christian idea of the suffering of God in Christ.

In A Theology of the Pain of God (1946), the Japanese writer Kazoh Kitamori (1916–98) argued that true love was rooted in pain. “God is the wounded Lord, having pain in himself.” God is able to give meaning and dignity to human suffering on account of the fact that he also is in pain, and suffers. Like Moltmann, Kitamori draws heavily upon Luther’s “theology of the cross,” seeing this as having a special relevance to Japan in the aftermath of its defeat in the Second World War and the nuclear annihilation of the populations of two of its cities, Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Other influences could also be noted that have helped to create a new receptivity toward the idea of a suffering God. The rise of “process thought” (see pp. 193–4) gave a new impetus to speaking of God as “a fellow sufferer who understands” (A. N. Whitehead). Yet many who welcomed this insight were hesitant over the theological framework that engendered it. Process thought’s emphasis upon the primacy of creativity seemed inconsistent with much traditional Christian thinking concerning the transcendence of God. An acceptable alternative was to ground the notion of God as a fellow sufferer in the self-limitation of God, especially in the cross of Christ.

Fresh studies of the Old Testament – such as Abraham Heschel’s (1907–72) God of the Prophets (1930) and T. E. Fretheim’s Suffering of God (1984) – drew attention to the manner in which the Old Testament often portrayed God as sharing in the pathos of Israel. God is hurt and moved by the suffering of God's people. If classical theism could not accommodate that insight, it was argued, then so much the worse for it.

Finally, the notion of “love” itself has been the subject of considerable discussion in the twentieth century. Theologians rooted in the classical tradition – such as Anselm and Aquinas – defined love in terms of expressions and demonstrations of care and goodwill toward others. It is thus perfectly possible to speak of God “loving impassibly” – that is, loving someone without being emotionally affected by that person's situation. Yet the new interest in the problem has raised questions over this notion of love. Can one really speak of “love” unless there is some mutual sharing of suffering and feelings? Surely “love” implies the lover's intense awareness of the suffering of the beloved, and thus some form of sharing in the beloved's distress? Such considerations have undermined the intuitive plausibility (yet not, interestingly, the intellectual credibility) of an impassible God.

Probably the most important recent discussion of the suffering of God stems from the German theologian Jürgen Moltmann, to whom we now turn.

A Suffering God: Jürgen Moltmann (Born 1926)

In the late twentieth century, it became “the new orthodoxy” to speak of a suffering God. Moltmann's Crucified God (1972) is widely regarded as the most significant and influential work to have expounded this idea, and has been the subject of intense discussion.

In The Crucified God (1972), Moltmann argued that the cross is both the foundation and the criterion of true Christian theology. The passion of Christ, and especially his cry of Godforsakenness – “My God! My God! Why have you forsaken me?” (Mark 15: 34) – stands at the center of Christian thinking. The cross must be seen as an event between the Father and the Son, in which the Father suffers the death of his Son in order to redeem sinful humanity.

Moltmann argues that a God who cannot suffer is a deficient, not a perfect, God. Stressing that God cannot be forced to change or undergo suffering, Moltmann declares that God willed to undergo suffering. The suffering of God is the direct consequence of the divine decision to suffer and of the divine willingness to suffer:

A God who cannot suffer is poorer than any human. For a God who is incapable of suffering is a being who cannot be involved. Suffering and injustice do not affect him. And because he is so completely insensitive, he cannot be affected or shaken by anything. He cannot weep, for he has no tears. But the one who cannot suffer cannot love either. So he is also a loveless being.

Moltmann here brings together a number of the considerations we noted earlier, including the idea that love involves the lover participating in the sufferings of the beloved.

The idea of a suffering God might at first sight seem to be heretical in the eyes of Christian orthodoxy. The patristic period identified two unacceptable views relating to the suffering of God: “patripassianism” and “theopaschitism.” The former was regarded as a heresy and the latter as a potentially misleading doctrine. They merit brief discussion before we proceed further.

Patripassianism arose during the third century and was associated with writers such as Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius. It centered on the belief that the Father suffered as the Son. In other words, the suffering of Christ on the cross is to be regarded as the suffering of the Father. According to these writers, the only distinction within the Godhead was a succession of modes or operations. In other words, Father, Son, and Spirit were just different modes of being, or expressions, of the same basic divine entity. This form of modalism, often known as Sabellianism, will be explored further in relation to the doctrine of the Trinity (see p. 309).

Theopaschitism arose during the sixth century and was linked with writers such as John Maxentius. The basic slogan associated with the movement was “one of the Trinity was crucified.” The formula can be interpreted in a perfectly orthodox sense (it reappears as Martin Luther's celebrated formula "the crucified God") and was defended as such by Leontius of Byzantium (c.500–c.543). However, it was regarded as potentially misleading and confusing by more cautious writers, including Pope Hormisdas (450–523), and the formula gradually fell into disuse.

The doctrine of a suffering God rehabilitates theopaschitism and interprets the relationship between the suffering of God and of Christ in such a way that it avoids the patripassian difficulty. For example, Kitamori distinguishes the ways in which Father and Son suffer. "God the Father who hid himself in the death of God the Son is God in pain. Therefore the pain of God is neither merely the pain of God the Son, nor merely the pain of God the Father, but the pain of two persons who are essentially one." Perhaps the most sophisticated statement of this doctrine is to be found in Moltmann's Crucified God.

Moltmann argues that the Father and the Son suffer – but they experience that suffering in different manners. The Son suffers the pain and death of the cross; the Father gives up the Son and suffers his loss. Although both Father and Son are involved in the cross, their involvement is not identical (the patripassian position) but distinct. "In the passion of the Son, the Father himself suffers the pains of abandonment. In the death of the Son, death comes upon God himself, and the Father suffers the death of his Son in his love for forsaken man."

Moltmann's confident assertion that "death comes upon God" naturally leads us to consider whether God can be thought of as having died – or, even more radically, as being dead.

The Death of God?

If God can suffer, can God also die? Or is God now dead? These questions demand consideration as part of any discussion of the suffering of God in Christ. Hymns, as much as theology textbooks, bear witness to the beliefs of Christianity. A number of significant hymns of the Christian church make reference to the death of God, exulting in the paradox that the immortal God should die on the cross. Perhaps the most celebrated example is Charles Wesley's eighteenth-century hymn "And Can It Be?," which includes the following lines:

Amazing love! how can it be

That thou, my God, shouldst die for me?

These lines express the idea of Jesus Christ, the immortal God incarnate, giving himself up to death as an expression of love and commitment. This thought is also expressed elsewhere in that same hymn, as here:

'Tis mystery all! th'immortal dies!

Who can explore his strange design?

But how, one wonders, can one speak of God "dying"? For a few weeks in 1966, theology hit the national headlines in the United States. Time magazine ran an edition declaring that God was dead. Three relatively obscure writers, having little in common – Paul van Buren (1924–98), William Hamilton (1924–2012), and Thomas J. J. Altizer (born 1927) – were suddenly declared to be the prophets of a radical new movement, characterized by its godless theology. In fact, these writers had quite different interests and agendas. The "death of God" was really a creation of the media.

Slogans such as "God is dead" and "the death of God" suddenly became of national interest. In its issue of February 16, 1966, Christian Century magazine provided a satirical application form for its readers to join the "God-Is-Dead-Club." Puzzling new terms began to appear in the learned journals: "theothanasia," "theothanatology," and "theothanatopsis" became ephemeral buzz-words before happily lapsing into fully merited obscurity.

Two quite distinct lines of interpretation may be discerned lying behind the slogan "the death of God."

The first line of interpretation is the belief, especially linked with the nineteenth-century German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), that human civilization has reached a stage at which it may dispense with the notion of God. The crisis of faith in the west, especially western Europe, which developed during the nineteenth century, finally matured. Nietzsche's declaration (in The Happy Science, 1882) that "God is dead! God remains dead! And we have killed him!" expresses the general cultural atmosphere which finds no place for God. A similar notion was characteristic of the 1960s' "Death of God" movement, as can be seen from these words of William Hamilton, one of the theologians associated with this movement:

We are not talking about the absence of the experience of God, but about the experience of the absence of God. [...] The death of God must be affirmed; the confidence with which we thought we could speak of God is gone. [...] There remains a sense of not having, of not believing, of having lost, not just the idols or the gods of religion but God himself. And this is an experience that is not peculiar to a neurotic few, nor is it private or inward. Death of God is a public event in our history.

Similarly, in his Secular Meaning of the Gospel (1963), Paul van Buren, arguing that the word "God" had ceased to have any meaning, sought to ascertain how the gospel might be stated in purely atheological terms. Belief in a transcendent God was replaced by commitment to a "Jesus-ethic," centered on respect for the lifestyle of Jesus. Thomas J. J. Altizer's Gospel of Christian Atheism (1966) refocused the question by suggesting that, while it was no longer acceptable to talk about Jesus being God, one could still talk about God being Jesus – thus giving a moral authority to Jesus's words and deeds, even if belief in a God was no longer to be retained.

Although subsequent predictions of the total secularization of western society remain conspicuously unfulfilled, the "death of God" motif seems to capture the atmosphere of an important moment in western cultural history. The subsequent revival of the fortunes of God in American religion and society left this movement looking curiously out of touch with reality.

The second line of interpretation is the totally distinct belief that Jesus Christ has such a high profile of identification with God that one can speak of God “dying” in Christ. Just as God suffers in Christ, so one can speak of God experiencing death or “perishability” (Eberhard Jüngel) in the same manner. This approach is considerably less interesting culturally, although it is probably much more significant theologically. Partly in reaction to developments in the United States, especially the widespread circulation given to the slogan “God is dead,” Jüngel wrote a paper entitled “The Death of the Living God” (1968), in which he argued that, through the death of Christ, God becomes involved in “perishability.” Jüngel, who developed these ideas at greater length in God as the Mystery of the World (1977), thus sees the theme of “the death of God” as an important affirmation of God's self-identification with the transitory world of suffering.

Developing related ideas in his Crucified God, Moltmann spoke (a little cryptically, it must be said) of “death in God.” God identifies with all who suffer and die, and thus shares in human suffering and death. These aspects of human history are thereby taken up into the history of God. “To recognize God in the cross of Christ [...] means to recognize the cross, inextricable suffering, death and hopeless rejection in God.” Moltmann makes this point using a poignant episode from a famous passage in the novel Night (1956), by Elie Wiesel (born 1928), describing an execution at Auschwitz. As a crowd watches three people die by hanging, someone asks, “Where is God?” Moltmann uses this episode to make the point that, through the cross of Christ, God tastes and is affected by death. God knows what death is like.

The Omnipotence of God

The Apostles' Creed opens with the confident words “I believe in God, the Father almighty.” Belief in an “almighty” or omnipotent God is widely seen as being a core, essential element of basic Christian faith. But what does it mean to speak of God being “omnipotent”? A commonsense approach to the matter defines omnipotence like this:

if God is omnipotent then God can do anything. Of course, God cannot make a square circle, or a round triangle; this is a logical self-contradiction. But the idea of divine omnipotence seems to imply that God must be able to do anything which does not involve obvious contradiction.

A more subtle problem is raised by the following question: can God create a stone which is too heavy for God to lift? If God cannot create such a stone, the idea of total divine omnipotence would seem to be denied. Yet, if God could create such a stone, there is something else which God cannot do – namely, lift that stone. And so, at least on the face of it, God turns out not to be omnipotent.

Such logical explorations are unquestionably valuable, in that they cast light on the difficulties of speaking about God. One of the most important rules of Christian theology is to ask closely concerning the meaning of words. Words with one meaning in a secular context often have more developed, subtle, or nuanced meanings in a theological setting. “Omnipotence” is an excellent example, as we shall see.

Defining Omnipotence

We may explore the definition of omnipotence by considering some arguments developed by C. S. Lewis (1898–1963) in his celebrated book The Problem of Pain (1940). Lewis begins by stating the problem as follows: “If God were good, he would wish to make his creatures perfectly happy, and if God were almighty he would be able to do what he wished. But the creatures are not happy. Therefore God lacks either the goodness, or power, or both.” This is the problem of pain, in its simplest form. But what does it mean to say that God is omnipotent? Lewis argues that it does not mean that God can do anything. Once God has opted to do certain things, or to behave in a certain manner, then other possibilities are excluded:

If you choose to say “God can give a creature free will and at the same time withhold free will from it,” you have not succeeded in saying anything about God: meaningless combinations of words do not suddenly acquire a meaning because we prefix to them the two other words: “God can.” It remains true that all things are possible with God: the intrinsic impossibilities are not things but non-entities.

God, then, cannot do anything that is logically impossible. But Lewis takes the case further: God cannot do anything that is inconsistent with the divine nature. It is not merely logic, he argues, but the very nature of God which prevents God from doing certain things.

The point at issue here had been made much earlier by Anselm of Canterbury in his Proslogion, as he meditated upon the nature of God. Anselm noted that omnipotence – understood as the ability to do all things – was not necessarily a good thing. If God is omnipotent, God could do things such as tell lies or pervert justice. Yet this is clearly inconsistent with the Christian understanding of the nature of God. The concept of divine omnipotence must therefore be modified by the Christian understanding of the divine nature and character. This point is brought out particularly clearly by Thomas Aquinas, as he discusses the issue of whether God can sin:

It is commonly said that God is almighty. Yet it seems difficult to understand the reason for this, on account of the doubt about what is meant when it is said that “God can do ‘everything’.” [...] If it is said that God is omnipotent because he can do everything possible to his power, the understanding of omnipotence is circular, doing nothing more than saying that God is omnipotent because he can do everything that he can do. [...] To sin is to fall short of a perfect action. Hence to be able to sin is to be able to be deficient in relation to an action, which cannot be reconciled with omnipotence. It is because God is omnipotent that he cannot sin.

Aquinas's discussion makes it clear that further clarification is needed concerning the idea of divine omnipotence. An important advance in this matter was the distinction between “the two powers of God,” especially associated with the fourteenth-century writer William of Ockham (c.1285–1347). We turn to this discussion now.

The Two Powers of God

How can God act absolutely reliably, without being subject to some external agency which compels God to act in this reliable way? This question was debated with some heat at the University of Paris in the thirteenth century, in response to a form of determinism originally developed by the writer Averroes (1126–98). For Averroes, the reliability of God ultimately rested upon external pressures. God was compelled to act in certain ways – and thus acted reliably. This approach was, however, regarded with intense suspicion by most theologians, who saw it as a crude denial of the freedom of God. But how could God be said to act reliably, unless it was through external compulsion?

The answer given by Christian writers such as Duns Scotus (1266–1308) and William of Ockham takes the following form: the reliability of God is ultimately grounded in the divine nature itself. God does not act reliably because someone or something makes God act in this way, but because of a deliberate and free divine decision to act like this. God's reliability or faithfulness is not externally constrained but is determined by God's own character.

In his discussion of the opening line of the Apostles' Creed – “I believe in God, the Father almighty” – Ockham asks precisely what is meant by the word “almighty” (omnipotens). It cannot, he argues, mean that God is presently able to do everything. God was once free to act in any way. However, by doing this, God has now established an order of things which reflects a loving and righteous divine will and that order, once established, will remain until the end of time. God is therefore not now able to do anything which contradicts this established order.

Ockham uses two important terms to refer to these different options. The “absolute power of God” (potentia absoluta) refers to the options that existed before God committed himself to any course of action or world ordering. The “ordained power of God” (potentia ordinata) refers to the order established by God their creator as an expression of the divine nature and character. The “two powers of God” do not refer to two different sets of options now open to God. Rather, they refer to two different moments in the history of salvation

The distinction is important, yet difficult. In view of this, we shall explore it in a little more detail. Ockham is inviting us to consider two very different situations in which we might speak of the “omnipotence of God.” The first is this: God is confronted with a whole array of possibilities – such as creating the world or not creating the world. God can choose to actualize any of these possibilities. This is the absolute power of God.

But then God selects some options and brings them into being. We are now in the realm of the ordained power of God – a realm in which God's power is restricted, by virtue of God's own decision. Ockham's point is this: by choosing to actualize some options, God has to choose not to actualize others. Choosing to do something means choosing to reject something else. Once God has chosen to create the world, the option of not creating the world is set to one side. This means that there are certain things which God could do once which can no longer be done. Although God could have decided not to create the world, God has now deliberately rejected that possibility. And that rejection means that this possibility is no longer open. God's actions thus limit God's options.

This leads to what seems, at first sight, to be a paradoxical situation. On account of the divine omnipotence, God is not now able to do everything. By exercising the divine power, God has limited options. For Ockham, God cannot now do everything. God has deliberately limited the possibilities. God chose to limit the options which are now open. Is that a contradiction? No. If God is really capable of doing anything, God must be able to become committed to a course of action – and stay committed to it. God, in exercising omnipotence, chose to restrict the range of options available. This notion of divine self-limitation, explored by Ockham, is important in modern theology, and merits further exploration.

The Notion of Divine Self-Limitation

The idea of God's self-limitation began to be explored with new interest in the nineteenth century, specifically within a Christological context. The favored framework for the discussion of the idea of divine self-limitation was usually that suggested by Philippians 2: 6–7, which speak of Christ “emptying himself.” This passage is often regarded as a pre-Pauline hymn, cited by Paul to make some important theological points. The term “kenoticism” (from the Greek kenosis, “an emptying”) came to be widely used to refer to an approach to the identity of Christ which speaks of his “emptying himself” of the attributes of divinity – either by leaving them behind or by setting them to one side.

German theologians sympathetic to this approach – such as Gottfried Thomasius (1802–75), W. F. Gess (1819–91), and F. H. R. von Frank (1827–94) – argued that God chose a course of self-limitation in becoming incarnate in Christ. Thomasius adopted the position that God (or, more accurately, the divine logos) set aside (or became emptied of) the divine metaphysical attributes (such as omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence) in Christ while retaining the moral attributes (such as divine love, righteousness, and holiness). Gess, however, insisted that God set aside all the attributes of divinity in the incarnation, thus making it virtually impossible to speak of Christ being “divine” in any sense of the term.

In England, the idea of kenoticism was later in developing and took a somewhat different form. Convinced that traditional Christologies did not do justice to the humanity of Christ (tending to portray him in terms which approached Docetism), writers such as P. T. Forsyth (1848–1921) and Charles Gore (1853–1932) argued that those attributes of divinity which tended to be seen as obliterating Christ's humanity had been set to one side. Thus, Gore's Incarnation of the Son of God (1891) developed the idea that Christ's full earthly humanity involved a voluntary self-emptying of his divine knowledge, with a resulting human ignorance. There was thus no difficulty raised by the observation that the gospel records seemed to suggest that Jesus was possessed of a limited knowledge at points.

At first sight, this appears to be a debate affecting Christology, not the doctrine of God. Yet, on further reflection, it becomes clear that, from a Christian perspective, the identity of Christ shapes our understanding of the identity of God. This can be seen with particular vividness in the later writings of Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–45), who interprets the powerlessness of the crucified Christ as a paradigm for the powerlessness of God in the world. In his Letters and Papers from Prison, dating from the closing years of the Second World War, Bonhoeffer reflects on this point as follows:

God lets himself be pushed out of the world on to the cross. He is weak and powerless in the world, and that is precisely the way, the only way, in which he is with us and helps us. [...] The Bible directs us to God's powerlessness and suffering; only the suffering God can help.

In an age which has become increasingly suspicious of the idea of “power,” it is perhaps refreshing to be reminded that talk about “God almighty” does not necessarily imply that God is a tyrant but that God chooses to stand alongside people in their powerlessness – a major theme in interpretations of the cross of Christ, to which we shall return in Chapter 11 (pp. 273–5).

God's Action in the World

In what sense can God be said to be present and active within the world? A number of models have been developed to articulate the richness of the Christian understanding of this matter, and they are probably best regarded as complementary rather than competitive. In what follows, we shall explore several approaches to this important question. We begin, however, by asking what sort of divine action we are talking about.

“Special” and “General” Divine Action

The first two decades of the twenty-first century have witnessed a renewed surge of interest in the question of whether, and to what extent, God may be said to act in the world. The language of divine action is integral to both the Old and the New Testaments. The God of Israel is regularly and definitively depicted and described as a God who acts in history. God's identity and character are understood to be made visible in the sphere of human action and reflection. Israel understood and represented God as one who acted in nature and in history. The New Testament maintains this belief and focuses it on the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth and on the action of the Holy Spirit. We shall consider the theological significance of the Holy Spirit in Chapter 12, noting particularly how the Spirit is linked with the themes of divine action and presence in the world, and in believers.

A distinction is often drawn between “Deist” and “Theist” understandings of God. These terms are widely used in the theological literature, although there are some disputes about their precise interpretation. In general terms, the word “Deist” is often used to refer to a way of thinking about God which affirms the idea that God created the world but not that God continues to be engaged with the creation.

Deism was found to be attractive by many in the eighteenth century, as it chimed with the new scientific discoveries which emphasized the regularity of the universe (see the next section). It remains influential today. A generalized and generic deism – similar to that of the “Age of Reason” – has gained considerable influence in the west since the Second World War, partly as a means of positioning the three monotheistic faiths – Christianity, Islam, and Judaism – within a common theological matrix that enables maximal social inclusivity.

“Theism,” on the other hand, designates a view of God which affirms both God's activity in the original creation of the world and an ongoing concern for the world. This latter idea is often expressed in terms of the idea of “providence,” which is often understood as some special divine action or influence which guides or governs the created order in general, and human beings in particular.

A related distinction needs to be noted here. If the idea of divine action is conceded, is this to be understood in terms of some general influence of God or some special interaction with the created order? Deism tends to believe in a God who does very little, if anything – but, if God can be said to “act,” it is through the causal agency of the laws of nature. God may thus bring about particular purposes through the original creation of the world's initial conditions and laws of nature. Some scholars thus distinguish a “general divine action,” understood as those actions of God that apply to the whole of creation, and a “special divine action,” understood as those actions of God that apply to a specific time and place in creation. A good example of a “special divine action” is the concept of a “miracle,” which is often interpreted in terms of God acting specially to redirect the course of nature.

We begin our discussion of how God might be said to act in nature by looking at Deism in a little more detail.

Deism: God Acts Through the Laws of Nature

In the previous section, we noted how the Newtonian emphasis upon the mechanical regularity of the universe was closely linked with the rise of the movement known as “Deism.” The Deist position can be summarized very succinctly as follows. God created the world in a rational and ordered manner that reflected God's own rational nature, and endowed it with the ability to develop and function without the need for any continuing divine presence or interference. Alexander Pope's (1688–1744) celebrated epitaph for Isaac Newton (1643–1727) brings out the popular understanding of the scientist's importance.

Nature and Nature's Law lay hid in Night

God said, let Newton be, and all was light.

This viewpoint, which became especially influential in the eighteenth century, regarded the world as a watch and God as the watchmaker. God endowed the world with a certain self-sustaining design, such that it could subsequently function without the need for continual intervention. It is thus no accident that William Paley (1743–1805) chose to use the image of a watch and watchmaker as part of his celebrated defense of the existence of a creator God (pp. 162–3).

So how does God act in the world, according to Deism? The simple answer to this question is that God does not act in the world. Like a watchmaker, God endowed the universe with its regularity (seen in the “laws of nature”) and set its mechanism in motion. Having provided the impetus to set the system in motion, and having established the principles which govern that motion, there is nothing left for God to do. The world is to be seen as a large-scale watch which is completely autonomous and self-sufficient. No action by God is necessary.

Inevitably, this led to the question of whether God could be eliminated completely from the Newtonian worldview. If there was nothing left for God to do, what conceivable need was there for any kind of divine being? If it can be shown that there are self-sustaining principles within the world, there is no need for the traditional idea of “providence” – that is, for the sustaining and regulating hand of God to be present and active throughout the entire existence of the world.

The Newtonian worldview thus encouraged the view that, although God may well have created the world, there was no further need for divine involvement. The discovery of the laws of conservation (e.g., the laws of conservation of momentum) seemed to imply that God had endowed the creation with all the mechanisms that it required in order to continue. It was this point that the astronomer Pierre-Simon Laplace (1749–1827) was making in his famous comment concerning the idea of God as a sustainer of planetary motion: “I have no need of that hypothesis.”

A more activist understanding of the manner in which God acts in the world, which focuses on the use of secondary causes, stems from Thomas Aquinas and modern writers influenced by him.

Thomism: God Acts Through Secondary Causes

A somewhat different approach to the issue of God's action in the world can be based on the writings of the leading medieval theologian Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas's conception of divine action focuses on the distinction between primary and secondary causes. According to Aquinas, God does not work directly in the world but through secondary causes.

The idea is best explained in terms of an analogy. Suppose we imagine a pianist who is remarkably gifted. She possesses the ability to play the piano beautifully. Yet the quality of her playing is dependent upon the quality of the piano with which she is provided. An out-of-tune piano will prove disastrous, no matter how expert the player. In our analogy, the pianist is the primary cause and the piano the secondary cause for a performance of, for example, a Chopin nocturne. Both are required; each has a significantly different role to play. The ability of the primary cause to achieve the desired effect is dependent upon the secondary cause which has to be used.

Aquinas uses this appeal to secondary causes to deal with some of the issues relating to the presence of evil in the world. Suffering and pain are not to be ascribed to the direct action of God but to the fragility and frailty of the secondary causes through which God works. God, in other words, is to be seen as the primary cause, and various agencies within the world as the associated secondary causes.

For Aristotle (from whom Aquinas draws many of his ideas), secondary causes are able to act in their own right. Natural objects are able to act as secondary causes by virtue of their own nature. This view was unacceptable to most theistic philosophers of the Middle Ages, whether Christian or Islamic. For example, the noted Islamic writer al-Ghazali (1058–1111) held that nature is completely subject to God, and it is therefore improper to speak of secondary causes having any independence. God causes things directly. If lightning sets a tree on fire, the fire is not caused by the lightning but by God. God is thus to be seen as the primary cause who alone is able to move other causes. In the view of many historians of science, this approach to divine causality (often known as “occasionalism”) is unhelpful to the development of the natural sciences, as it downplays the regularity of actions and events within nature, and their apparent “law-like” nature.

Aquinas thus argues that God is the “unmoved mover,” the prime cause of every action, without whom nothing could happen at all. Yet he allows that God can act indirectly, through secondary causes. The theistic interpretation of secondary causes thus offers the following account of God's action in the world. God acts indirectly in the world through secondary causes. A great chain of causality can be discerned, leading back to God as the originator and prime mover of all that happens in the world. Yet God does not act directly in the world but through the chain of events which God initiates and guides.

Aquinas's approach leads to the idea of God initiating a process which develops under divine guidance. God, so to speak, delegates divine action to secondary causes within the natural order. For example, God might move a human will from within so that someone who is ill receives assistance. Here an action which is God's will is carried out indirectly by God – yet, according to Aquinas, we can still speak of this action being “caused” by God in some meaningful way.

A related approach was developed by the British philosophical theologian Austin Farrer (1904–68). This account of divine action is often termed “double agency.” According to Farrer, every action which takes place in the world includes a causal role for one or more agents or objects (the “secondary” causes) and a distinct role for God as the “primary” cause of what occurs. We could therefore speak of an ordered nexus of created causes and effects which are ultimately dependent upon divine agency. Two different orders of efficacy can be distinguished: a “horizontal” order of created causes and effects, and a “vertical” order through which God establishes and sustains the former.

An approach which is clearly related to this, but that differs radically at points of significance, can be found in the movement known as “process thought,” to which we now turn.

Process Theology: God Acts Through Persuasion

The origins of “process thought” are generally agreed to lie in the writings of the Anglo-American philosopher Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947), especially his important work Process and Reality (1929). Reacting against the rather static view of the world associated with traditional metaphysics (expressed in ideas such as “substance” and “essence”), Whitehead conceived reality as a process. The world, as an organic whole, is something dynamic, not static; it is something which happens. Reality is made up of building blocks of “actual entities” or “actual occasions,” and is thus characterized by becoming, change, and event.

All these “entities” or “occasions” (to use Whitehead's original terms) possess a degree of freedom to develop and be influenced by their surroundings. It is perhaps at this point that the influence of biological evolutionary theories can be discerned: like Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955), Whitehead wanted to allow for development within creation, subject to some overall direction and guidance. Causation is not seen in terms of an entity being forced to act in a given manner: it is a matter of influence and persuasion. Entities influence each other in a “dipolar” manner – mentally and physically. Precisely the same is true of God as of other entities. God can only act in a persuasive manner, within the limits of the process itself. God “keeps the rules” of the process. Just as God influences other entities, so God is also influenced by them. God, to use Whitehead's famous phrase, is “a fellow-sufferer who understands.” God is thus affected and influenced by the world.

Process thought thus redefines God's omnipotence in terms of persuasion or influence within the overall world-process. This is an important development, as it explains the attraction of this way of understanding God's relation to the world in relation to the problem of evil. Where the traditional free-will defense of moral evil argues that human beings are free to disobey or ignore God, process theology argues that the individual components of the world are likewise free to ignore divine attempts to influence or persuade them. They are not bound to respond to God. God is thus absolved of responsibility for both moral and natural evil.

The traditional free-will defense of God in the face of evil is persuasive (although the extent of that persuasion is contested) in the case of moral evil – in other words, evil resulting from human decisions and actions. But what of natural evil? What of earthquakes, famines, and other natural disasters? Process thought argues that God cannot force nature to obey the divine will or purpose for it. God can only attempt to influence the process from within, by persuasion and attraction. Each entity enjoys a degree of freedom and creativity, which God cannot override.

While this understanding of the persuasive nature of God's activity has obvious merits, not least in the way in which it offers a response to the problem of evil (as God is not in control, God cannot be blamed for the way things have turned out), critics of process thought have suggested that too high a price is paid. The traditional idea of the transcendence of God appears to have been abandoned, or radically reinterpreted in terms of the primacy and permanency of God as an entity within the process. In other words, the divine transcendence is understood to mean little more than that God outlives and surpasses other entities.

Whitehead's basic ideas have been developed by a number of writers, most notably Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000), John B. Cobb (born 1925), and Schubert Ogden (born 1928). Hartshorne modified Whitehead's notion of God in a number of directions, perhaps most significantly by arguing that God's ability to be influenced by other entities does not mean that God is reduced to their level.

Process thought has no difficulty in speaking of “God's action within the world,” offering a framework within which this action can be described in terms of “influence within the process.” Nevertheless, the specific approach adopted causes anxiety within traditional approaches to the doctrine of God. For traditional theists, the God of process thought seems to bear little relation to the God described in the Old or New Testaments.

For many commentators, the real strengths of process theology lie in its insights into the origin and nature of suffering within the world. Those strengths are best appreciated through an analysis of the various alternatives on offer within the Christian tradition concerning suffering – an area of theology which has come to be known as “theodicy,” to which we shall presently turn. But, first, we must explore the doctrine of creation, which sets the backdrop to these important discussions.

God as Creator

The doctrine of God as creator is central to the Old Testament (e.g., Genesis 1, 2). In the history of theology, the doctrine of God the creator has often been linked with the authority of the Old Testament. The continuing importance of the Old Testament for Christianity is often held to be grounded in the fact that the God of which it speaks is the same God to be revealed in the New Testament. The creator God and the redeemer God are one and the same. In the case of Gnosticism, a vigorous attack was mounted on both the authority of the Old Testament and the idea that God was the creator of the world.

Development of the Doctrine of Creation

The theme of “God as creator” is of major importance within the Old Testament. Attention has often been focused on the creation narratives found in the first two chapters of the book of Genesis, with which the Old Testament canon opens. However, it must be appreciated that the theme is deeply embedded in the wisdom and prophetic literature of the Old Testament. For example, Job 38: 1 to 42: 6 sets out what is unquestionably the most comprehensive understanding of God as creator to be found in the Old Testament, stressing the role of God as creator and sustainer of the world.

It is possible to discern two distinct, though related, contexts in which the notion of “God as creator” is encountered: first, in contexts which reflect the praise of God within Israel's worship, both individual and corporate; and, second, in contexts which stress that the God who created the world is also the God who liberated Israel from bondage and who continues to sustain Israel in the present.

The doctrine of creation plays different roles within the three main bodies of writings in the Old Testament – the historical, prophetic, and wisdom writings. In the historical books, the doctrine of creation is often used to combat the nature religion of Canaan, which held that various nature divinities (such as the Canaanite “El”) needed to be propitiated in order to secure a good harvest. Within the prophetic writings, particularly those of the exilic age (the period of the Exile, when much of the population of Jerusalem was deported to Babylon), the doctrine is used to affirm the universal sovereignty of the God of Israel. The God who made the whole world is ruler of that world – including nations such as Babylonia, who were presently oppressing Israel. The gods of Babylon were merely local creations, lacking the power and authority of the God of Israel. The doctrine of creation thus became the foundation of the hope of liberation. Within the wisdom writings, particularly Job and Proverbs, the doctrine of creation is linked to the acquisition of wisdom. The wise are able to find and discern wisdom within the created world, and order their lives in accord with its precepts.

Of particular interest for our purposes is the Old Testament theme of “creation as ordering,” and the manner in which the critically important theme of “order” is established on, and justified with reference to, cosmological foundations. It has often been pointed out how the Old Testament portrays creation in terms of an engagement with, and victory over, forces of chaos. This “establishment of order” is generally represented in two different ways:

1. Creation is an imposition of order on a formless chaos. This model is especially associated with the image of a potter working clay into a recognizably ordered structure (e.g., Genesis 2: 7; Isaiah 29: 16, 64: 8; Jeremiah 18: 1–6).
2. Creation concerns conflict with a series of chaotic forces, often depicted as a dragon or another monster (variously named Behemoth, Leviathan, Nahar, Rahab, Tannim, or Yam) who must be subdued (Job 3: 8, 7: 12, 9: 13, 40: 15–41: 11; Psalm 74: 13–15; Isaiah 27: 1).

It is clear that there are parallels between the Old Testament account of God engaging with the forces of chaos, and Ugaritic and Canaanite mythology. Nevertheless, there are significant differences at points of importance, not least in the Old Testament's insistence that the forces of chaos are not to be seen as divine. Creation is not to be understood in terms of different gods warring against each other for mastery of a (future) universe but in terms of God's mastery of chaos and ordering of the world.

This theme became of particular importance during the exilic period. Before this period, there are reasons for thinking that the theme of the covenant between God and Israel was seen as more important than the doctrine of creation. This seems to have changed during the exilic age. The extensive appeal to the doctrine of creation in the prophetic writings of this period (such as Isaiah 40–55) affirmed that the God of Israel was not a mere local divinity but had authority throughout the world, and reassured believers that physical absence from their homeland did not deny them access to their God.

Perhaps one of the most significant affirmations which the Old Testament makes is that nature is not divine. The Genesis creation account stresses that God created the moon, sun, and stars. The significance of this point is too easily overlooked. Each of these celestial entities was worshiped as divine in the ancient world. By asserting that they were created by God, the Old Testament insists that they are subordinate to God and have no intrinsic divine nature.

Having briefly introduced some aspects of the concept of creation, particularly within a Jewish or Christian context, we may now pass on to consider some of its aspects in a more theological manner.

Creation and the Rejection of Dualism

The central issue relating to the doctrine of creation which had to be debated in the first period of Christian theology was that of “dualism.”

The classic example of this is found in some of the forms of Gnosticism, so forcefully opposed by Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202), which argued for the existence of two gods: a supreme god, who was the source of the invisible spiritual world, and a lesser deity who created the world of visible, material things. A similar outlook is associated with Manicheism, a Gnostic worldview which Augustine of Hippo (354–430) found attractive as a young man. This approach is strongly dualist, in that it sets up a fundamental tension between the spiritual realm (which is seen as being good) and the material realm (which is seen as being evil). Some Gnostics argued that God exploited the created world. In response, Irenaeus argued that creation was an act of pure love. God created humanity “in order to have someone to whom benefits might be given.”

For Gnosticism, in most of its significant forms, a sharp distinction was to be drawn between the God who redeemed humanity from the world and a somewhat inferior deity (often termed “the demiurge”) who created that world in the first place. The Old Testament was regarded by the Gnostics as dealing with this lesser deity, whereas the New Testament was concerned with the redeemer God. As such, belief in God as creator and in the authority of the Old Testament came to be interlinked at an early stage. The doctrine of creation affirmed that the material world was created good by God, despite its subsequent contamination by sin.

The dualist notion of a good realm of the invisible and spiritual and an evil realm of the visible and material is excluded by the Council of Nicea (325), whose creed opened with an affirmation of faith in “God, the Father, the almighty, the maker of all things seen and unseen.” This was reinforced by the Synod of Toledo (400), which was explicit in its rejection of dualism:

If anyone says and believes that this world and all its instruments have not been created by the almighty God, let him be anathema. [...] If anyone says or believes that the world has been made by a god other than the one of whom it is written, “In the beginning, God created heaven and earth” (Genesis 1: 1), let him be anathema.

This view was further reinforced by Pope Leo I (c.400–61) in a letter of 447 in which he defined “true faith” as consisting of the belief that “the substance of all spiritual and physical creatures is good, and that there is no nature of evil. For God, the creator of all things, has not made anything that is not good.”

It was, however, Augustine of Hippo who provided the definitive statement of a nondualist theology that had such a major impact on western thought. The fundamental principles underlying this unitary vision of reality can be summarized as follows:

1. Everything that exists owes that existence to God. There is no alternative source or origin of existence.
2. Everything that exists was created good by a good God.
3. The evil that exists within the world is not to be thought of as something positive and real, possessing its own distinct substance. Rather, it is to be thought of as a “lack of goodness” (privatio boni).
4. Evil does not derive its origin from God but from humanity's use of its God-given freedom.

The Apostles' Creed opens with a declaration of faith in God as “maker of heaven and earth,” thus affirming the divine creation of both the spiritual and material realms. During the Middle Ages, forms of dualism once more made their appearance, particularly in the views of the Cathari and Albigenses, who taught that matter is evil and was created ex nihilo (“from nothing”) by the devil. Against such views, the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and the Council of Florence (1442) taught explicitly that God created a good creation out of nothing.

Earlier in this section, we commented on one aspect of Augustine's views on creation. Yet Augustine is of such importance to the development of the doctrine of creation that his contribution requires further discussion and comment.

The Doctrine of Creation of Augustine of Hippo (354–430)

In his work On the Literal Meaning of Genesis (401–15), Augustine of Hippo set out to provide a doctrine of creation based on what he regarded as a reliable interpretation of the Genesis creation accounts. Augustine argues that God brought everything into existence in a single moment of creation. Yet the created order is not static, in that God has endowed it with the capacity to develop. Augustine uses the image of a dormant seed as an analogy for this process. God embeds seeds (more technically, rationes seminales, “seed-bearing reasons”) within the original created order, and these will grow and develop at the right time. There is a clear analogy here with the idea of the logos spermatikos, the “seed-bearing reason,” widely used by Greek-speaking Christian writers to illuminate the doctrine of creation (p. 10).

Earlier Christian writers had noted how the first Genesis creation narrative spoke of the earth and the waters “bringing forth” living creatures, and had drawn the conclusion that this pointed to God endowing the natural order with a capacity to generate living things. Augustine took this idea further. God had created the world complete with a series of dormant powers, which would be actualized at appropriate moments through divine providence.

Augustine argues that Genesis 1: 12 implies that the earth has received the power or capacity to produce things by itself: “Scripture has stated that the earth brought forth the crops and the trees causally, in the sense that it received the power of bringing them forth.” Where some might think of creation in terms of God's insertion of new kinds of plants and animals ready-made into an already existing world, Augustine rejects this as inconsistent with the overall witness of Scripture. Rather, God must be thought of as creating in that very first moment the potencies for all the kinds of living things that would come later, including humanity.

Augustine's interpretation of Genesis does not limit God's creative action to the primordial act of origination. God is, Augustine insists, still working within the world, directing its continuing development and unfolding its potential. He argues that God's work of creation includes both the initial origination of the world and its subsequent development. There are two "moments" in creation: a primary act of origination and a continuing process of providential guidance. Creation is thus not a completed past event. God must be recognized to be working even now, in the present, sustaining and directing the unfolding of the "generations that he laid up in creation when it was first established."

This means that the first Genesis creation account describes the instantaneous bringing into existence of primal matter, including causal resources for further development. The second Genesis account explores how these causal possibilities emerged and developed from the earth. Taken together, the two Genesis creation accounts declare that God made all things simultaneously but they also envisage that the various kinds of living things will make their appearance gradually over time – as they were meant to by their creator.

For Augustine, God created a universe that was deliberately designed to develop and evolve. The blueprint for that evolution is not arbitrary but is programmed into the very fabric of creation. God's providence superintends the continuing unfolding of the created order. Augustine's image of the "seed" implies that the original creation contained within it the potentialities for all the living kinds that would subsequently emerge. This does not mean that God created the world incomplete or imperfect, because "what God originally established in causes, he subsequently fulfilled in effects." This process of development, Augustine declares, is governed by fundamental laws, which reflect the will of their creator: "God has established fixed laws governing the production of kinds and qualities of beings, and bringing them out of concealment into full view.”

The Doctrine of Creation Ex Nihilo

Christianity initially took root and then expanded in the eastern Mediterranean world of the first and second centuries, which was dominated by various Greek philosophies. The general Greek understanding of the origins of the world could be summarized as follows. God was not to be thought of as having created the world. Rather, God was to be thought of as an architect, who ordered pre-existent matter. Matter was already present within the universe and did not require to be created; it needed to be given a definite shape and structure. God was therefore thought of as the one who fashioned the world from this already existing matter. Thus, in one of his dialogues (Timaeus), Plato developed the idea that the world was made out of pre-existent matter which was fashioned into the present form of the world.

This idea was taken up by most Gnostic writers, who were here followed by a few early Christian theologians such as Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215) and Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165). They professed a belief that pre-existent matter had been shaped into the world in the act of creation. In other words, creation was not “from nothing” (ex nihilo); rather, it was to be seen as an act of construction, on the basis of material which was already available – just as someone might construct an igloo out of snow, or a house from stone. The existence of evil in the world was thus to be explained on the basis of the intractability of this pre-existent matter. God's options in creating the world were limited by the poor quality of the material available. The presence of evil or defects within the world is thus not to be ascribed to God but to deficiencies in the material from which the world was constructed.

However, the conflict with Gnosticism forced reconsideration of this issue. In part, the idea of creation from pre-existent matter was discredited by its Gnostic associations; in part, it was called into question by an increasingly sophisticated reading of the Old Testament creation narratives. Reacting against this Platonist worldview, several major Christian writers of the second and third centuries argued that everything had to be created by God. There was no pre-existent matter; it was necessary that everything had been created out of nothing. Writing in the late second century, Irenaeus argued that the Christian doctrine of creation affirmed the inherent goodness of creation, which contrasted sharply with the Gnostic idea that the material world was evil. Theophilus of Antioch (died c.183–5) took a similar line around the same time: “If God had drawn the world from pre-existent matter, what would be so extraordinary about that? A human artisan makes whatever he wants from a material that is already there, while God shows his power by starting to make all he wants from nothing.”

Tertullian, writing in the third century, emphasized the divine decision to create the world. The existence of the world is itself due to God's freedom and goodness, not to any inherent necessity arising from the nature of matter. The world depends on God for its existence. This contrasted sharply with the Aristotelian view that the world depended on nothing for its existence, and that the particular structure of the world was intrinsically necessary. Augustine of Hippo defended and explored the implications of the doctrine of creation ex nihilo at several points in his writings, as noted earlier.

Yet not all Christian theologians adopted this position at this early stage in the emergence of the Christian tradition. Origen (c.185–c.254), perhaps one of the most Platonist of the early Christian writers, clearly regarded the doctrine of creation from pre-existent matter to have some merit. By the end of the fourth century, however, most Christian theologians had rejected the Platonist approach, even in the form associated with Origen, and argued for God being the creator of both the spiritual and the material worlds.

Implications of the Doctrine of Creation

The doctrine of God as creator has several major implications, of which some may be noted here.

First, a distinction must be drawn between God and the creation. Creation is not itself divine; it is a divine creation which is ontologically distinct from its creator. God exists necessarily; the created order exists contingently. A major theme of Christian theology from the earliest of times has been to resist the temptation to merge the creator and the creation. The theme is clearly stated in Paul's letter to the Romans, the opening chapter of which criticizes the tendency to reduce God to the level of the world. According to Paul, there is a natural human tendency, as a result of sin, to serve "created things rather than the creator" (Romans 1: 25). A central task of a Christian theology of creation is to distinguish God from the creation while at the same time to affirm that it is God's creation.

Second, creation implies God's authority over the world. A characteristic biblical emphasis is that the creator has authority over the creation. Humans are thus regarded as part of that creation, with special functions within it. The doctrine of creation leads to the idea of human stewardship of the creation, which is to be contrasted with a secular notion of human ownership of the world. The creation is not ours; we hold it in trust for God. Human beings are meant to be the stewards of God's creation, and are responsible for the manner in which they exercise that stewardship. This insight is of major importance in relation to ecological and environmental concerns because it provides a theoretical foundation for the exercise of human responsibility toward the planet.

Third, the doctrine of God as creator implies the original goodness of creation. Throughout the first biblical account of creation, we encounter the affirmation: "And God saw that it was good" (Genesis 1: 10, 18, 21, 25, 31). (The only thing that is "not good" is that Adam is alone. Humanity is created as a social being and is meant to exist alongside others.) There is no place in Christian theology for the Gnostic or dualist idea of the world as an inherently evil place. As we noted earlier in this chapter, even though the world is fallen through sin, it remains God's good creation and is capable of being redeemed.

This is not to say that the creation is presently perfect. An essential component of the Christian doctrine of sin is the recognition that the world has departed from the trajectory upon which God placed it in the work of creation. It has become deflected from its intended course. It has fallen from the glory in which it was created. The world as we see it is not the world as it was intended to be. Human sin, evil, and death are themselves tokens of the extent of the departure of the created order from its intended pattern. For this reason, most Christian reflections on redemption include the idea of some kind of restoration of creation to its original integrity, in order that God's intentions for his creation might find fulfillment. Affirming the goodness of creation also avoids the suggestion, unacceptable to most theologians, that God is responsible for evil. The constant biblical emphasis upon the goodness of creation is a reminder that the destructive force of sin is not present in the world by God's design. Sin is not something that God intends for the creation.

Fourth, a major theme of the creation narrative in the book of Genesis is that human beings, both male and female, are created in the image of God. This insight, central to any Christian doctrine of human nature, will be discussed at greater length later (pp. 327–9); it is, however, of major importance as an aspect of the doctrine of creation itself. “You made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless until they find their rest in you” (Augustine of Hippo). With these words, the importance of the doctrine of creation for a proper understanding of human experience (pp. 327–34), nature, and destiny is established.

Models of God as Creator

The manner in which God acts as creator has been the subject of intense discussion within the Christian tradition. A number of models of, or ways of picturing, the manner in which God is to be thought of as creating the world have been developed, each of which casts some light on the complex and rich Christian understanding of the notion of “creation.”

Emanation

This term was widely used by early Christian writers to clarify the relationship between God and the world. Although the term is not used by either Plato or the third-century Neoplatonist philosopher Plotinus (204/5–270), many patristic writers sympathetic to the various forms of Platonism saw it as a convenient and appropriate way of articulating Platonic insights. The image that dominates this approach is that of light or heat radiating from the sun, or a human source such as a fire. This image of creation (hinted at in the Nicene Creed's phrase “light from light”) suggests that the creation of the world can be regarded as an overflowing of the creative energy of God. Just as light derives from the sun and reflects its nature, so the created order derives from God and expresses the divine nature. There is, on the basis of this model, a natural or organic connection between God and the creation.

However, the model has weaknesses, of which two may be noted. First, the image of a sun radiating light, or a fire radiating heat, implies an involuntary emanation rather than a conscious decision to create. The Christian tradition has consistently emphasized that the act of creation rests upon a prior decision on the part of God to create, which this model cannot adequately express.

This naturally leads on to the second weakness, which relates to the impersonal nature of the model in question. The idea of a personal God, expressing a personality both in the very act of creation and in the subsequent creation itself, is difficult to convey by this image. Nevertheless, the model clearly articulates a close connection between creator and creation, leading us to expect that something of the identity and nature of the creator is to be found in the creation. Thus, the beauty of God – a theme which was of particular importance in early medieval theology and which has emerged as significant again in the later writings of Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88) – would be expected to be reflected in the nature of the creation.

Construction

Many biblical passages portray God as a master builder, deliberately constructing the world (e.g., Psalm 127: 1). The imagery is powerful, conveying the ideas of purpose, planning, and a deliberate intention to create. The image is important because it draws attention to both the creator and the creation. In addition to bringing out the skill of the creator, it allows the beauty and ordering of the resulting creation to be appreciated, both for what it is in itself and for its testimony to the creativity and care of its creator.

However, the image has a deficiency which relates to a point made in connection with Plato's dialogue Timaeus. This portrays creation as involving pre-existent matter. Here, creation is understood as giving shape and form to something which is already there – an idea which, we have seen, causes at least a degree of tension with the doctrine of creation ex nihilo. The image of God as a builder would seem to imply the assembly of the world from material which is already to hand, which is clearly at odds with the notion of creation out of nothing.

Nevertheless, despite this difficulty, it can be seen that the model expresses the insight that the character of the creator is, in some manner, expressed in the natural world, just as that of an artist is communicated or embodied in his or her work. In particular, the notion of “ordering” – that is, the imparting or imposing of a coherence or structure to the material in question – is clearly affirmed by this model. Whatever else the complex notion of “creation” may mean within a Christian context, it certainly includes the fundamental theme of ordering – a notion which is especially significant in the creation narratives of the Old Testament.

Artistic Expression

Many Christian writers, from various periods in the history of the church, speak of creation as the “handiwork of God,” comparing it to a work of art which is beautiful in itself, as well as expressing the personality of its creator. This model of creation as the “artistic expression” of God as creator is particularly well expressed in the writings of the eighteenth-century North American theologian Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), as we saw earlier (p. 148).

The image is profoundly helpful as it supplements a deficiency of both the two models noted above – namely, their impersonal character. The image of God as artist conveys the idea of personal expression in the creation of something beautiful. Once more, the potential weaknesses need to be noted; for example, the model could easily lead to the idea of creation from pre-existent matter, as in the case of a sculptor with a statue carved from an already existing block of stone. However, the model offers us at least the possibility of thinking about creation from nothing, as in the case of the author who writes a novel or the composer who creates a melody and harmony. These lines of thought were creatively developed by Dorothy L. Sayers (1893–1957) in her Mind of the Maker (1941), which proposed parallels between the divine act of creation and the human writing of a book. Sayers' book also encourages us to seek the self-expression of God in the creation, and gives added theological credibility to a natural theology (see pp. 141–7). There is also a natural link between the concept of creation as “artistic expression” and the highly significant concept of “beauty.”

Creation and Christian Approaches to Ecology

The closing decades of the twentieth century saw growing interest in the way in which the world is valued by human beings. Some writers argued that an exploitative attitude to nature, typical of the twentieth century, is a direct result of the Christian doctrine of creation. In an influential 1967 essay, the historian Lynn White Jr. (1907–87) argued that the Judeo-Christian idea of humanity having dominion or authority over creation has led to the view that nature exists to serve human needs, thus legitimating a highly exploitative attitude. Christianity, he argued, thus bears a substantial burden of guilt for the modern ecological crisis.

In particular, White argued that Christianity was to blame for the emerging ecological crisis on account of its use of the concept of the “image of God,” found in the Genesis creation account (Genesis 1: 26–7), as a pretext for justifying human exploitation of the world's resources. The book of Genesis, he argued, legitimates the notion of human domination over the creation, leading to its exploitation. Despite its historical and theological superficiality, White's essay had a profound impact on the shaping of popular scientific attitudes toward Christianity in particular and religion in general.

With the passage of time, a more informed evaluation of White's essay has gained the ascendancy. The argument is now recognized to be seriously flawed. A closer reading of the Genesis text indicates that such themes as “humanity as the steward of creation” and “humanity as the partner of God” are indicated by the text, rather than a theme of “humanity as the lord of creation.” Far from being the enemy of ecology, the doctrine of creation affirms the importance of human responsibility toward the environment.

In a widely read study, Imaging God: Dominion as Stewardship (1986), the Canadian theologian Douglas John Hall (born 1928) stressed that the biblical concept of “domination” was to be understood specifically in terms of “stewardship,” no matter what kind of interpretation might be placed on the word in a secular context. To put it simply: the Old Testament sees creation as the possession of humanity; it is something that is to be seen as entrusted to humanity, which is responsible for its safekeeping and tending. Similar lines of thought can be found in other religions, with discernible differences of emphasis and grounding; the Assisi Declaration (1986) on the ecological importance of religion may be seen as marking the recognition of this significant point.

A doctrine of creation can thus act as the basis for an ecologically sensitive ethic. For example, the environmentalist Calvin B. DeWitt (born 1935) has argued that four fundamental ecological principles can readily be discerned within the biblical narratives, reflecting the Christian doctrine of creation.

1. The “earthkeeping principle”: just as the creator keeps and sustains humanity, so humanity must keep and sustain the creator's creation.
2. The “sabbath principle”: the creation must be allowed to recover from human use of its resources.
3. The “fruitfulness principle”: the fecundity of the creation is to be enjoyed, not destroyed.
4. The “fulfillment and limits principle”: there are limits set to humanity's role within creation, with boundaries set in place which must be respected.

A further contribution has been made by Jürgen Moltmann, noted for his concern to ensure the theologically rigorous application of Christian theology to social, political, and environmental issues. In his 1985 work God in Creation, Moltmann argues that the exploitation of the world reflects the rise of technology, and seems to have little to do with specifically Christian teachings. Furthermore, he stresses the manner in which God can be said to indwell the creation through the Holy Spirit, so that the pillage of creation becomes an assault on God. On the basis of this analysis, Moltmann is able to offer a rigorously trinitarian defense of a distinctively Christian ecological ethic.

Theodicies: The Problem of Evil

A major problem which concerns the doctrine of God centers on the existence of evil in the world. How can the presence of evil or suffering be reconciled with the Christian affirmation of the goodness of the God who created the world? Traditionally, the problem of evil is framed in a four-step argument:

1. God is good.
2. A good God would not permit suffering or evil.
3. Yet suffering and evil are observed in the world.
4. Therefore a good God does not exist.

This fourth statement could be interpreted as implying either that there is no God or that God is not good.

Some approaches to “theodicy” – the technical term widely used to refer to an intellectual defense of God's goodness or existence in the face of the presence of evil and suffering – rest on redefining the categories in which the dilemma is stated. For example, something might initially be thought to be “evil,” yet closer examination discloses that it is able to bring about a good that was not initially suspected. Others explore the complex interaction between goodness and evil. Something that is good can, if abused or misused, lead to evil. This lies at the heart of the traditional free-will account of evil, which sees evil as the result of human misuse of its God-given freedom.

Alternatively, it might be argued that good can only ultimately develop from a context in which evil is present – an argument which lies at the heart of John Hick's (1922–2012) “vale of soul-making” theodicy, which we shall consider below.

In what follows, we shall explore some of the options available within the Christian tradition, and offer a brief assessment of their merits.

Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202)

Irenaeus represents a major element within Greek patristic thought, which regards human nature as a potentiality rather than a fully developed actuality. Human beings are created with certain capacities for growth toward maturity and perfection. They are called to achieve perfection rather than being perfect already. This process of growth and development requires contact with, and experience of, good and evil if truly informed decisions are to be made. If we are to be good, we need to know its opposite. This tradition tends to view the world as a “vale of soul-making” (to use a term taken from the English poet John Keats, 1795–1821), in which an encounter with evil is seen as a necessary prerequisite for spiritual growth and development:

God made humanity to be master of the earth and of all which was there. [...] Yet this could only take place when humanity had attained its adult stage. [...] Yet humanity was little, being but a child. It had to grow and reach full maturity. [...] God prepared a place for humanity which was better than this world [...] a paradise of such beauty and goodness that the Word of God constantly walked in it, and talked with humanity; prefiguring that future time when he would live with human beings and talk with them, associating with human beings and teaching them righteousness. But humanity was a child; and its mind was not yet fully mature; and thus humanity was easily led astray by the deceiver.

This view is not developed fully in the writings of Irenaeus. In the modern period, it has found an able exponent in the British philosopher of religion John Hick, who is widely regarded as the most influential and persuasive bastion of such an approach. In his influential book Evil and the God of Love (1966), Hick emphasized that human beings are created incomplete. In order for them to become what God intends them to be, they must participate in the world. God did not create human beings as automatons but as individuals who are capable of responding freely to God. Unless a real choice is available between good and evil, the biblical injunctions to “choose good” are meaningless. Good and evil are thus necessary presences within the world, in order that informed and meaningful human development may take place.

The argument is obviously attractive, not least on account of its emphasis upon human freedom. It also resonates with the experience of many Christians who have found that God's grace and love are experienced most profoundly in situations of distress or suffering. However, criticism has been directed against one aspect of this approach in particular. The objection is often raised that it appears to lend dignity to evil, by allocating it a positive role within the purposes of God. If suffering is seen simply as a means of advancing the spiritual development of humanity, what are we to make of those events – such as Hiroshima or Auschwitz – which destroy those who encounter them? This approach, to its critics, seems merely to encourage acquiescence in the presence of evil in the world, without giving any moral direction or stimulus to resist and overcome it.

The distinctive approach adopted by Augustine has had a major impact upon the western theological tradition. By the fourth century, the problems raised by the existence of evil and suffering had begun to become something of a theological embarrassment. Gnosticism – including its variant form, Manicheism, with which Augustine became fascinated as a young man – had no difficulty in accounting for the existence of evil. It arose from the fundamentally evil nature of matter. The entire purpose of salvation was to redeem humanity from the evil material world and transfer it to a spiritual realm which was uncontaminated by matter.

As noted earlier, a central aspect of many Gnostic systems was the idea of a demiurge – that is, a demigod who was responsible for forging the world, in its present form, out of pre-existent matter. The sorry state of the world was put down to the inadequacies of this demigod. The redeemer god was thus regarded as being quite distinct from the creator demigod.

Augustine, however, could not accept this approach. It might offer a neat solution to the problem of evil, yet the intellectual price paid was far too high. For Augustine, creation and redemption were the work of one and the same God. It was therefore impossible to ascribe the existence of evil to creation, for this merely transferred blame to God. For Augustine, God created the world good, meaning that it was free from the contamination of evil. So where does evil come from? Augustine's fundamental insight here is that evil is a direct consequence of the misuse of human freedom. God created humanity with the freedom to choose good or evil. Sadly, humanity chose evil; as a result, the world is contaminated by evil.

This, however, did not really resolve the problem, as Augustine himself appreciated. How could humans choose evil if there was no evil to choose? Evil had to be an option within the world if it were to be accessible to human choice. Augustine therefore located the origin of evil in satanic temptation, by which Satan lured Adam and Eve away from obedience to their creator. In this way, he argued, God could not be regarded as being responsible for evil.

Still the problem was not resolved. For where did Satan come from if God created the world good? Augustine traces the origin of evil back by another step. Satan is a fallen angel, who was originally created good, like all the other angels. However, this particular angel was tempted to become like God and to assume supreme authority. As a result, he rebelled against God, and thus spread that rebellion to the world. But how, Augustine's critics asked, could a good angel turn out to be so bad? How are we to account for the original fall of that angel? The problem had simply been pushed back by a stage, not resolved.

Thoroughly dissatisfied with existing approaches to evil, Karl Barth called for a complete rethinking of the entire issue. Barth, who was particularly concerned with the Reformed approach to the issue of providence, believed that a central theological flaw had developed in relation to the notion of the omnipotence of God. He argued that the Reformed doctrine of providence had become virtually indistinguishable from that of Stoicism. (In passing, we may note that many scholars of the Reformation make precisely this point in relation to Huldrych Zwingli's (1484–1531) doctrine of providence, which appears to be based upon the Stoic writer Seneca (4 bc–ad 65) to a far greater extent than upon the New Testament!) For Barth, the notion of the omnipotence of God must always be understood in the light of God's self-revelation in Christ.

On the basis of this principle, Barth argued that there was a need for a “radical rethinking of the whole issue.” He suggested that the Reformed doctrine of omnipotence rested largely upon logical deduction from a set of premises about God's power and goodness. Barth, whose theological program is distinguished by its “Christological concentration,” argued for a more Christological approach. Barth thus rejected a priori notions of omnipotence in favor of a belief in the triumph of God's grace over unbelief, evil, and suffering. A confidence in the ultimate triumph of the grace of God enables believers to maintain their morale and hope in the face of a world which is seemingly dominated by evil. Barth himself had Nazi Germany in mind as he developed this notion; his ideas, however, have proved useful elsewhere, and may be argued to be reflected in the theodicies that have been characteristic of liberation theology in more recent years.

Nevertheless, one aspect of Barth's theodicy has caused considerable discussion. Barth describes evil as das Nichtige – a mysterious power of “nothingness,” which has its grounds in what God did not will in the act of creation. “Nothingness” is that which contradicts the will of God. Das Nichtige is the “uninvited” enemy, an unwanted intruder into created life. It is not “nothing” but that which threatens to reduce everything else to nothing, and thus poses a threat to the purposes of God in the world. For Barth, the ultimate triumph of grace ensures that “nothingness” need not be feared. However, his critics have found the idea of “nothingness” problematic, and have charged him with lapsing into arbitrary metaphysical speculation at a point at which fidelity to the biblical narrative is of central importance.

Barth can certainly be defended against these criticisms. However, it is fair to point out that his notion of “nothingness” is very difficult to grasp and leaves many sympathetic interpreters puzzled by its apparent incoherence.

Alvin Plantinga (Born 1932)

The Reformed philosopher Alvin Plantinga often addressed the questions arising from the existence of evil in the world. The “free-will defense” offered by Plantinga is deeply rooted in the Christian tradition and can be summarized in terms of the following points:

1. Free will is morally important. That means that a world in which human beings possess free will is superior to a hypothetical world in which they do not.
2. If human beings were forced to do nothing but good, that would represent a denial of human free will.
3. God must bring into being the best possible world that he is able to provide.
4. It must therefore follow that God must create a world with free will.
5. This means that God is not responsible if human beings choose to do evil, since God is operating under self-imposed constraints that mean God will not compel human beings to do good.

In reviewing this argument, it is important to note how Plantinga insists that we must be cautious and responsible about using terms such as “omnipotent.” To say that God is omnipotent is not, as we saw earlier, to say that “God can do anything.” God operates under self-imposed limitations, reflecting God's nature and character. Plantinga brings this point out frequently. For example, in his essay “God, Evil, and the Metaphysics of Freedom,” Plantinga argues convincingly that it is possible that God cannot create every logically possible world. If Plantinga's argument has a weak point, it is not to be found in his discussion of God's omnipotence but in his assertion that a world with freedom is to be preferred to one that is without freedom.

Other Recent Contributions

The question of suffering remains high on the agenda of modern theology, and has been given a new sense of urgency and importance through the impact of the horrors of the Second World War and the continued struggle of oppressed people against those who oppress them. A number of approaches may be noted, each of which can be set against a different backdrop.

First, liberation theology has developed a distinctive approach to suffering, based on its emphasis upon the poor and the oppressed (see pp. 74–5). The suffering of the poor is not viewed as passive acquiescence in suffering; rather, it is seen as participation in the struggle of God against suffering in the world – a struggle which involves direct confrontation with suffering itself. This idea, in various forms, can be discerned in the writings of Latin American liberation theologians.

However, it is generally thought to find its most powerful expression in the writings of black theology, especially those of James Hal Cone (born 1938). The sequence of the cross and resurrection is interpreted in terms of a present struggle against evil, conducted in the knowledge of God's final victory over all suffering and that which causes it. Similar themes can be noted in the writings of Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–68), especially his “Death of Evil upon the Seashore” (1956).

Second, process theology locates the origins of suffering and evil within the world in a radical limitation upon the power of God (pp. 193–4). God has set aside the ability to coerce, retaining only the ability to persuade. Persuasion is seen as a means of exercising power in such a manner that the rights and freedoms of others are respected. God is obliged to persuade every aspect of the process to act in the best possible manner. There is, however, no guarantee that God's benevolent persuasion will lead to a favorable outcome. The process is under no obligation to obey God.

God intends good for the creation and acts in its best interests. However, the option of coercing everything to do the divine will cannot be exercised. As a result, God is unable to prevent certain things from happening. Wars, famines, and holocausts are not things that God desires; they are, however, not things that God can prevent, on account of the radical limitations placed upon the divine power. God is thus not responsible for evil, nor can it be said, in any way, that God desires or tacitly accepts its existence. The metaphysical limits placed upon God are such as to prevent any interference in the natural order of things.

A third strand in recent thinking on suffering has drawn upon Old Testament themes. Jewish writers such as Elie Wiesel, retaining at least the vestiges of a belief in the fundamental goodness of God, point to the numerous passages in the Old Testament that protest against the presence of evil and suffering in the world. This approach has been picked up by a number of Christian writers, including John Roth (born 1940), who has named the approach “protest theodicy.” The protest in question is seen as part of the trusting response of a faithful people to their God, in the face of uncertainties and anxieties concerning God's presence and purposes in the world.

This chapter has provided a general introduction to the Christian doctrine of God, which needs to be supplemented by the material on the Holy Spirit (Chapter 12) and the doctrine of the Trinity, which seeks to give expression to a sequence of distinctively Christian insights concerning God which go beyond both Deism and Theism (Chapter 13). We now move on to explore a central Christian theological theme – the identity and significance of Jesus Christ.

1. “God reveals himself as Lord” (Karl Barth). What difficulties does this statement raise by its use of masculine language in relation to God? How could they be resolved? Do you think the problem is restricted to the word “himself”? Or does it also extend to “Lord”?
2. Many Christians talk about having a “personal relationship” with God. What might they mean by this? What theological insights does this way of speaking offer?
3. “God can do anything.” How would you respond to this definition of divine omnipotence?
4. Why do so many Christians believe that God suffers? What difference does it make?

THE PERSON OF JESUS CHRIST

Who is Jesus Christ? And why is he so important for the Christian faith? The Christian doctrine of the person of Christ (“Christology”) sets out to explore why the little slice of human history called “Jesus of Nazareth” might hold the key to the nature of God and of human destiny. An excellent starting point for our reflections in this chapter is found in Pope John Paul II’s (1920–2005) encyclical letter Faith and Reason (1998):

In the Incarnation of the Son of God we see forged the enduring and definitive synthesis which the human mind of itself could not even have imagined: the Eternal enters time, the Whole lies hidden in the part, God takes on a human face. The truth communicated in Christ’s Revelation is therefore no longer confined to a particular place or culture, but is offered to every man and woman who would welcome it as the word which is the absolutely valid source of meaning for human life.

The area of theology referred to as “Christology” sets out to locate Jesus of Nazareth on a conceptual map. It attempts to place him along the coordinates of time and eternity, humanity and divinity, particularity and universality, and answer the question of how an event which took place at a specific time and place can be relevant for all people and all times.

The classical Christian account of the significance of Jesus of Nazareth is framed in terms of the concept of the “incarnation” and the doctrine of the “two natures” of Christ – divine and human. Jesus Christ is referred to as “God incarnate.” These ideas will probably seem strange to those new to the study of Christian theology. For this reason, it may be helpful to set the scene for the material presented in this chapter by sketching its themes, before going into them in more detail later.

As the church wrestled with the question of the identity and significance of Jesus of Nazareth, especially during the patristic period, it realized that it had to consider a wide range of models of interpretation. By the end of the fourth century, the church had made up its collective mind and decided that the only way of describing Jesus of Nazareth adequately was what has come to be known as the “two natures” formula – namely, that Jesus is “truly divine and truly human.” This is often referred to as the “Chalcedonian definition,” as it was fully set out by the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

This chapter sets out to explain the origins and development of this way of thinking about Jesus Christ, and how it has been understood, developed, and contextualized in the long history of Christian theology.

The Place of Jesus Christ in Christian Theology

The person of Jesus Christ is of central importance to Christian theology. That is why this chapter is the longest in this textbook. Whereas “theology” could be defined as “talk about God” in general, “Christian theology” accords a central role to Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is understood as the “image of the invisible God” (Colossians 1: 15), allowing us to see what God is like. There are four basic elements to the Christian understanding of the place of Jesus Christ in theology. The first is historical, whereas the other three are more explicitly theological in character.

Jesus Christ is the Historical Point of Departure for Christianity

This observation is relatively straightforward. It is a simple matter of historical fact that the coming of Jesus of Nazareth brought the Christian community into being. However, the interpretation of this matter is actually rather more complex. Consider, for example, the question of whether Jesus of Nazareth introduced anything new into the world. For the writers of the Enlightenment, Jesus of Nazareth did little more than republish a religion of nature which was promptly corrupted by his followers, including Paul. Rationalism thus argued that Jesus had nothing that was both right and new to say; where he was right he merely agreed with what sound human reason had always known to be the case, and if he said anything that was new (that is, hitherto unknown to reason) this would, by definition, be irrational and hence of no value.

A very different approach is associated with German liberal Protestantism (see pp. 70–1), especially as this is developed in the writings of Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl (1822–89). Ritschl argued that Jesus of Nazareth brought something new to the human situation, something which reason had hitherto neglected. “Jesus was conscious of a new and hitherto unknown relation to God.” Where rationalists believed in a universal rational religion, of which individual world religions were at best shadows, Ritschl argued that this was little more than a dream of reason, an abstraction without any historical embodiment. Christianity possesses certain definite theological and cultural characteristics as an historical religion, partly due to Jesus of Nazareth.

Important though this historical consideration might be, Christian theology has generally located the significance of Jesus Christ in three specifically theological areas, which we shall note in what follows.

Jesus Christ Reveals God

A central element of Christian theology centers upon the idea of a revelatory presence of God in Christ (see pp. 213–14, 230–1). Jesus Christ is regarded as making God known in a particular and specific manner, distinctive to Christianity. Perhaps the most radical statement of this conviction may be found in Karl Barth's (1886–1968) Church Dogmatics:

When Holy Scripture speaks of God, it does not permit us to let our attention or thoughts wander at random. [...] When Holy Scripture speaks of God, it concentrates our attention and thoughts upon one single point and what is to be known at that point. [...] If we ask further concerning the one point upon which, according to Scripture, our attention and thoughts should and must be concentrated, then from first to last the Bible directs us to the name of Jesus Christ.

This conviction has been central to mainstream Christianity down the ages. As we noted earlier, the writer of the Second Letter of Clement opens his letter with the affirmation that “we must think of Jesus Christ as of God.” The noted English theological writer Arthur Michael Ramsey (1904–88) makes the same theological point as Barth: “The importance of the confession ‘Jesus is Lord’ is not only that Jesus is divine, but that God is Christlike.”

This “Christological concentration” has been the subject of considerable debate among those concerned with dialogue between Christianity and other religions, and we shall return to consider its implications at a later stage in this work. Our concern at this stage is simply to note that, as a matter of historical fact, Christian theology has recognized that it is impossible to speak of “God” within the parameters of the Christian tradition without relating such statements to the person and work of Jesus Christ.

Jesus Christ is the Bearer of Salvation

A central theme of mainstream Christian thought is that salvation, in the Christian sense of the term, is manifested in and through and constituted on the basis of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ (see pp. 248–77). It must be noted that the term “salvation” is complex. To assert that “Jesus Christ makes salvation possible” is not to deny that other modes of salvation are accessible by other means; it is simply to insist that, within the Christian tradition, the distinctively Christian understanding of what salvation is can only be realized on the basis of Jesus Christ. We shall explore something of how Christian theology has understood both the nature of salvation (pp. 270–5) and how Jesus Christ is understood to be the basis of that salvation (pp. 251–68).

This central core of Christian belief has been the subject of some concern on the part of theological revisionists, alarmed at its potential implications for dialogue between Christianity and other religions, and we shall return to explore it at the appropriate point in this work. John Hick (1922–2012), for example, finds his pluralist approach to other religions challenged by certain highly distinctive elements of the Christian faith – including the resurrection of Christ, the divinity of Christ, and the Trinity. His proposals to eliminate these in order to facilitate his agenda of demonstrating that all faiths share the same basic features has not been well received. We shall return to this theme in Chapter 17.

Jesus Christ Defines the Shape of the Redeemed Life

A central issue in Christian spirituality and ethics concerns the nature of Christian existence, in relation to both its spiritual and its ethical dimensions. The New Testament itself is strongly “Christomorphic” in its view of the redeemed life – that is to say, it affirms that Jesus Christ not only makes that life possible but also determines its shape. The New Testament imagery of “being conformed to Christ” expresses this notion well.

The more recent rise of “narrative theology” (pp. 113–15) has given especial importance to this point. It has been emphasized that it is the narrative of Jesus Christ which exercises controlling influence over the Christian community. Christian belief, and especially Christian ethics, are shaped by the narrative of Jesus Christ, which gives flesh and substance to otherwise abstract ideas of values and virtues. The story of Jesus thus exercises a controlling influence over Christian thinking about ethics, in that the manner in which Jesus acted is seen as having continuing importance for the church today.

New Testament Christological Titles

The New Testament is the primary source for Christology. In this section, we shall explore the main Christological titles found in the New Testament, and their implications for our understanding of the identity of Christ. Why are these titles so important? For biblical writers, names convey insights about identity. The terms used to designate Jesus are the outcome of reflection on what he said, what he did, and what was done to him. Each title can be seen as adding a strand of insight to the tapestry of Christology. In what follows, we shall consider six of the main Christological titles of the New Testament, and reflect briefly on their importance.

Messiah

The New Testament's reflections on the significance of Christ are to be set against an Old Testament context. The term "Christ" – so easily treated as a surname – is actually a title, with a range of meanings which can only be fully appreciated in the light of the Old Testament expectation concerning the coming of God's "messiah" (Greek: christos). The Greek word christos translates the Hebrew term mashiah, most familiar in its anglicized form of "messiah," with the root meaning of "one who has been anointed." Although ancient Israel anointed both prophets and priests, the term came to be primarily reserved for the anointing of a king. Within the context of ancient Israel's strongly theocentric worldview, the king was regarded as someone who was appointed by God. Anointing – that is, the rubbing or covering of someone with olive oil – was thus a public sign of having been chosen by God for the task of kingship.

The term became linked to a set of expectations concerning the future of Israel which focused on the anticipated coming of a new king who, like David, would rule over a renewed people of God. There is evidence that such expectations reached new heights during the period of Roman occupation, with nationalist feelings becoming closely linked to messianic expectations. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls has cast much light on such expectations at this time. To designate any first-century Palestinian as "the anointed one" would be to make a powerful and deeply evocative affirmation of the importance of such a person.

The New Testament evidence for the use of this title for Jesus is complex, and its interpretation is open to dispute. For example, some have suggested that the Messiah was a divine figure; others have argued that this is not the case, and that the Messiah was merely one favored and acknowledged by God. However, it seems that a good case can be made for suggesting that the following four statements are plausible:

1. Jesus was regarded by some of those who were attracted to him as a potential political liberator, who would rally his people to throw off the Roman domination.
2. Jesus himself never permitted his followers to describe him as “Messiah” – something which has subsequently come to be known as the “messianic secret” (a phrase coined by the German New Testament scholar William Wrede, 1859–1906).
3. If Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah, it was not in the politicized form that was associated with Zealot or other strongly nationalist circles.
4. The contemporary expectation was that of a victorious messiah. The fact that Jesus suffered was seriously at odds with this expectation. If Jesus was a messiah, he was not the kind of messiah that people were expecting.

What, then, is the significance of the term for an understanding of the importance of Jesus? For the purpose of establishing Jesus's relation to Israel, the term is enormously important. It suggests that Jesus is to be regarded as the fulfillment of classical Jewish expectations, and lays the foundations for an understanding of the continuities between Judaism and Christianity. This issue was certainly important in first-century Palestine, and continues to be of importance in connection with Jewish–Christian relations today.

Son of God

The Old Testament used the term “Son of God” in a broad sense, perhaps best translated as “having the characteristics of God” or “belonging to God.” It was applied across a wide spectrum of categories, including the people of Israel in general (Exodus 4: 22) and especially the Davidic king and his successors who were to rule over that people (2 Samuel 7: 14). In this minimalist sense, the term could be applied equally to Jesus and to Christians. Jesus himself does not appear to have explicitly used the term of himself. It is found used in this way elsewhere in the New Testament, especially by Paul and in the letter to the Hebrews. Paul, for example, stated that Jesus had “been declared Son of God” on account of the resurrection (Romans 1: 4).

Paul uses the term “Son of God” in relation to both Jesus and believers. However, a distinction is drawn between the sonship of believers, which arises through adoption, and that of Jesus, which originates from his being “God's own son”(Romans 8: 32). In the fourth gospel and the Johannine letters, the term “son” (huios) is reserved for Jesus, while the more general term “children” (tekna) tends to be applied to believers. The basic notion appears to be that believers are enabled, through faith, to enter into the same kind of relationship as that which Jesus enjoys with the Father; nevertheless, the relationship between Jesus and the Father is either prior to, or foundational for, that between believers and God.

These observations raise an important issue, which must be noted here. Some readers will find references to “Son of God” problematic, on account of the use of exclusive language. The simple solution is to replace the masculine “son” with the more inclusive term “child.” Although this substitution is understandable, it blurs a series of crucial distinctions in the New Testament. For Paul, all believers – whether male or female – are “sons of God” by adoption. The point being made is that all believers enjoy inheritance rights – rights which, under the cultural conditions of the period, were enjoyed only by male children. In view of this major cultural problem, the present work will use the traditional exclusive language forms “Son of God” and “Son of Man” to deal with New Testament Christological titles, in much the same way as the traditional terms “Father” and “Son” are retained in the earlier analysis of the Trinity (see pp. 321–3).

Son of Man

For many Christians, the term “Son of Man” stands as a natural counterpart to “Son of God.” It is an affirmation of the humanity of Christ, just as the latter term is a complementary affirmation of his divinity. However, it is not quite as simple as this. The term “Son of Man” (Hebrew ben adam or Aramaic bar nasha) is used in three main contexts in the Old Testament:

1. as a form of address to the prophet Ezekiel;
2. to refer to a future eschatological figure (Daniel 7: 13–14), whose coming signals the end of history and the coming of divine judgment;
3. to emphasize the contrast between the lowliness and frailty of human nature and the elevated status or permanence of God and the angels (Numbers 23: 19; Psalm 8: 4).

The third such meaning brings out the humanity of Jesus and may underlie at least some of its uses in the synoptic gospels. It is, however, the second use of the term that has attracted most scholarly attention.

The German New Testament scholar Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) argued that Daniel 7: 13–14 points to the expectation of the coming of a “Son of Man” at the end of history, and argued that Jesus shared this expectation. References by Jesus to “the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory” (Mark 13: 26) are thus, according to Bultmann, to be understood to refer to a figure other than Jesus. Bultmann suggested that the early church subsequently merged “Jesus” and “Son of Man,” understanding them to be one and the same. The early church thus invented the application of the term to Jesus.

This view has not, however, commanded universal assent. Other scholars have argued that the term “Son of Man” carries a range of associations, including suffering, vindication, and judgment, thus making it natural and proper to apply it to Jesus. The British New Testament scholar George Caird (1917–84) developed such an approach, arguing that Jesus used the term “to indicate his essential unity with mankind, and above all with the weak and humble, and also his special function as predestined representative of the new Israel and bearer of God's judgment and kingdom.”

Lord

The acknowledgment that “Jesus Christ is Lord” (Romans 10: 9) appears to have become one of the earliest Christian confessions of faith, serving to distinguish those who believed in Jesus from those who did not. The term “Lord” (Greek kyrios; Aramaic mar) appears to have had powerful theological associations, partly on account of its use to translate the “Tetragrammaton” – the four Hebrew characters used to represent the sacred name of God in the Hebrew version of the Old Testament, often represented in English as “YHWH” or “Yahweh.” It was regarded as improper within Judaism to pronounce the name of God; an alternative word (adonai) was therefore used. In the Septuagint Greek translation of the Old Testament, the term kyrios is used to translate the name of God.

The Greek word kyrios thus came to be regarded as reserved for God within the biblical literature. The important first-century Jewish historian Josephus records an important incident in which Jews refused to take part in the emperor-cult which was a central part of the civil religion of the Roman empire. They refused to address the emperor as “lord” (kyrios), clearly on account of their belief that this term was appropriate to God alone. The use of the term to refer to Jesus in the New Testament thus draws on this rich tradition of association, implying a high degree of identity between Jesus and God.

This trend is illustrated by a number of passages within the New Testament which take Old Testament passages referring to God and apply them to Christ. Perhaps the most significant such occurrence is to be found at Philippians 2: 10–11, a passage which is clearly pre-Pauline. Here, a very early Christian writer, whose identity will probably remain forever unknown, takes the great Old Testament declaration (Isaiah 45: 23) that every knee will bow to the Lord God and transfers it to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Savior

For New Testament writers, Jesus is the “Savior, who is Christ the Lord” (Luke 2: 11). This theme is found throughout the New Testament: Jesus saves his people from their sins (Matthew 1: 21); in his name alone is there salvation (Acts 4: 12); he is the “captain of salvation” (Hebrews 2: 10). The basic idea is, at least on the face of it, quite simple: Jesus is the one who saves.

Yet this seemingly simple statement turns out to be rather more complex than it might at first seem. It must be recalled that the New Testament affirmations about Jesus Christ are to be set against a Jewish background. And for the Old Testament, there was only one who could save – the Lord God of Israel. The prophets regularly reminded Israel that it could not save itself, nor could it be saved by other nations round about it. It is the Lord, and the Lord alone, who will save, or forgive Israel's sins. This point is made with special force in some of the prophetic writings, such as Isaiah 45: 21–2:

Who declared it of old? Was it not I, the Lord?

And there is no other god apart from me, a righteous God and a Savior.

There is none apart from me.

Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth!

The New Testament use of the word “savior” to refer to Jesus thus turns out to be considerably more significant than a cursory reading might suggest. The title indicates that Jesus of Nazareth is being credited with doing something that, strictly speaking, only God can do.

This theme is also reflected in the gospel accounts of how Jesus healed a paralytic (Mark 2: 1–12). Jesus tells the paralytic that his sins are forgiven, to the outrage and astonishment of the Jewish teachers of the law watching him. Their reaction is one of disbelief: “He is blaspheming! Who can forgive sins but God alone!” (Mark 2: 7). Underlying this objection is a fundamental belief of the Old Testament: only God can forgive sin. Unless Jesus was God, he had no authority whatsoever to speak those words. He was deluded, or blaspheming. Yet Jesus declares that he does have such authority to forgive, and proceeds to heal the man (Mark 2: 10–11). The resurrection of Jesus demonstrated that Jesus had the right to act in this way, retrospectively validating his claims to authority on earth.

God alone forgives sins; yet Jesus forgives sin. God alone saves; yet Jesus also saves. So what does this say about the identity of Jesus? In the full knowledge that it was the Lord God alone who was savior, and that none other than God could save, the first Christians affirmed that Jesus was savior – that Jesus could save. This was a misunderstanding on the part of people ignorant of the Old Testament tradition. It was a confident statement of who Jesus had to be, in the light of what he achieved through his saving death and resurrection.

God

The New Testament was written against the background of the strict monotheism of Israel. The idea that anyone could be described as “God” would have been blasphemous within this Jewish context. Nevertheless, the noted Catholic New Testament scholar Raymond Brown (1928–98) has argued that there are three clear instances of Jesus being called “God” in the New Testament, with the momentous implications that this involves. These are:

1. The opening section of the fourth gospel, which includes the affirmation: “the Word was God” (John 1: 1).
2. The confession of Thomas, in which he addresses the risen Christ as “my Lord and my God” (John 20: 28).
3. The opening of the letter to the Hebrews, in which a psalm is interpreted as being addressed to Jesus as God (Hebrews 1: 8).

Given the strong reluctance of New Testament writers to speak of Jesus as “God,” because of their background in the strict monotheism of Israel, these three affirmations are of considerable significance. Many other texts have, of course, been argued to make similar affirmations; these three have been chosen to illustrate the point at issue, partly because there is widespread assent within the community of New Testament scholars concerning their importance in this respect.

To these verses which make statements concerning the identity of Jesus, there may be added a series of important New Testament passages which speak of the significance of Jesus in functional terms – that is to say, in terms which identify him as performing certain functions or tasks associated with God. Several of these prove to be of considerable significance.

Jesus is the Savior of Humanity

The Old Testament affirmed that there was only one savior of humanity: God. In the full knowledge that God alone could save, the first Christians affirmed that Jesus of Nazareth was their savior. For the New Testament, Jesus saves his people from their sins (Matthew 1: 21). Jesus is understood to function as God, doing something which, properly speaking, only God was permitted to do, according to Judaism. A fish came to be a symbol of faith to the early Christians, as the five Greek letters spelling out “fish” in Greek (I-CH-TH-U-S) came to represent the slogan “Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior.”

Jesus is Worshiped

Within the Jewish context in which the first Christians operated, it was God and God alone who was to be worshiped. Paul warned the Christians at Rome that there was a constant danger that humans would worship creatures when they ought to be worshipping their creator (Romans 1: 23). Yet the early Christian church worshiped Christ as God – a practice which is clearly reflected even in the New Testament. Thus, 1 Corinthians 1: 2 speaks of Christians as those who “call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,” using language which reflects the Old Testament formulae for worshipping or adoring God (such as Genesis 4: 26, 13: 4; Psalm 105: 1; Jeremiah 10: 25; Joel 2: 32). Jesus is thus clearly understood to function as God, in that he is an object of worship.

Jesus Reveals God

“Anyone who has seen me, has seen the Father” (John 14: 9). These remarkable words, so characteristic of the fourth gospel, emphasize the belief that the Father speaks and acts in the Son – in other words, that God is revealed in and by Jesus. To have seen Jesus is to have seen the Father – in other words, Jesus is understood, once more, to function as God.

These texts and themes would play a major role in shaping Christian reflection on how best to state the identity of Jesus of Nazareth. The church already knew that Christ was an authoritative teacher; that he forgave sins; that he was the fulfillment of the hopes of Israel; and many other points. The question they had to face was simple: what conceptual framework allows these insights to be woven together seamlessly? What is the best “big picture” which makes sense of all these components? What map can be drawn which allows all these insights to be positioned? We begin our exploration of this point by considering the patristic attempts to make sense of the identity of Christ.

The Patristic Debate Over the Person of Christ

The patristic period saw considerable attention being paid to the doctrine of the person of Christ, which became the defining issue for early Christianity, affecting – to mention only three issues – the way in which Christians related to the Roman imperial state, the way they worshiped, and their hope for the future. The debate about the identity of Christ was conducted primarily within the eastern church; interestingly, Augustine of Hippo never wrote anything of great consequence on Christology, presumably finding his time to be more than adequately occupied by debates over grace, the church, and the Trinity.

The task confronting the patristic writers was basically the development of a unified Christological scheme which would bring together and integrate the various Christological hints and statements, and images and models, found within the New Testament, some of which have been considered briefly above. That task proved complex. In view of its enormous importance for Christian theology, we shall consider its main stages of development in what follows.

Early Explorations: Ebionitism and Docetism

The theologians of the early church realized the importance of articulating the importance of Jesus Christ for the human mind, imagination, emotions, and behavior. In the course of its development in its first four centuries, the church had to deal with a number of interpretations of the identity of Jesus Christ which it regarded as failing to do justice to his significance. An improper location of Jesus Christ on a conceptual map could be fatal to Christian evangelism and discipleship. The first period of the development of Christology tended to center on the question of the divinity of Christ. Most early patristic writers were convinced that the New Testament spoke of Jesus Christ as a genuine human being. What required exploration and explanation was the way in which Jesus Christ differed from other human beings. Did he possess additional characteristics? Or did he lack some other normal human characteristics – such as being sinful?

This process of identifying the best conceptual framework within which to locate Jesus Christ proceeded cautiously. It was seen as important to explore and evaluate every conceivable possibility. One early approach was to take existing categories, inherited from the social matrices to which early Christians belonged, and treat these as appropriate to the task of conceptualizing the significance of Jesus Christ. The origins of such a trend can be seen inside the New Testament itself, in that the gospels record attempts to make sense of Jesus which are drawn from contemporary Judaism – such as interpreting Jesus of Nazareth as a second Elijah, a new Jewish prophet, or a High Priest of Israel.

Two early viewpoints were quickly rejected as heretical. “Ebionitism,” a primarily Jewish sect which flourished in the early centuries of the Christian era, regarded Jesus as an ordinary human being, the human son of Mary and Joseph. Most scholars consider that early second-century Ebionitism was characterized by a “low Christology” – that is, an understanding of Jesus of Nazareth which interprets him as spiritually superior to ordinary human beings. Jesus of Nazareth was seen as a human being who was singled out for divine favor by being possessed by the Holy Spirit, in a manner similar to, yet more intensive than, the calling of a Hebrew prophet. This approach assimilated Jesus to existing Jewish categories of divine presence and activity, especially that of the prophet.

Ebionitism is widely regarded as inadequate. The Swiss Protestant theologian Karl Barth argued against any Ebionite account of the identity of Jesus which treats him essentially as a heroic human being, or as a human being who was “adopted” by God. Barth interprets Ebionitism as an approach to Jesus of Nazareth characterized by a refusal to concede his intrinsic divinity, affirming only his humanity. While this is partly true, it does not really do justice to Ebionitism as an historical movement emerging from Judaism. Furthermore, Barth's approach makes it difficult to distinguish Ebionitism from Arianism (pp. 217–18), which can also be characterized as a denial of Christ's divinity.

More significant was the diametrically opposed view, which came to be known as “Docetism,” from the Greek verb dokeo, “to seem or appear.” The first explicit references to what is recognizable as a form of Docetism are found in some of the letters of Ignatius of Antioch (c.35–c.110), bishop of Antioch in Syria, who was martyred at Rome. Ignatius is remembered mainly on account of seven letters which both exercised considerable influence in the early church and bear important witness to some of its controversies. These letters show him to be concerned about the teachings of two groups, each of which clearly had influence within some Christian churches: the Judaizers, who wished Christianity to remain within the orbit of Judaism, and the Docetists, who argued that the suffering of Jesus was illusory. Ignatius's letters to the churches at Trallia and Smyrna clearly indicate that some were arguing that Christ merely appeared to suffer. Christ "really and truly did suffer, just as he really and truly rose again. His passion was no imaginary illusion."

Docetism – which is probably best regarded as a tendency within theology rather than a definite theological position – is perhaps best understood as the tendency to conceive Jesus Christ as totally divine, so that his humanity was merely an appearance. The sufferings of Christ are thus treated as apparent rather than real.

Docetism held a particular attraction for the Gnostic writers of the second century, during which period it reached its zenith. A good example of a Gnostic Christology is found in Valentinianism. This second-century heresy is usually attributed to Valentinus, who was born in Egypt and arrived in Rome around the year 135. Valentinus taught that Christ was a redeemer figure, who awakened the divine spark within humanity, enabling it to find its way back to its true home. In order to save those who were held captive by the body, the Savior "let himself be conceived and he let himself be born as an infant with body and soul."

Yet we need to be careful here, as early Christian sources indicate that, while some groups held that Jesus had only appeared to suffer, these are rarely described as "Docetists." Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202), for example, cites a number of unorthodox writers as claiming that Jesus of Nazareth "was a man merely in appearance"; he does not, however, refer to this as "Docetism."

Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165): the Logos Christology

By the end of the second century, however, other viewpoints were in the process of emerging, which would eventually eclipse this Docetic tendency. Justin Martyr, one of the most important second-century apologists, represents one such viewpoint. Justin's approach to Christology used the notion of the logos – a Greek term, extensively used in contemporary philosophy, which is often translated simply as “word” yet has far richer associations than this simple translation might suggest. Middle Platonism saw the logos as a mediating principle between the ideal and real worlds, allowing Christian theologians to explore the role of Jesus of Nazareth as mediator between God and humanity.

Justin was especially concerned to demonstrate that the Christian faith brought to fruition the insights of both classical Greek philosophy and Judaism. Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930) famously commented that Justin held that “Christ is the Logos and Nomos.” In other words, Christ brings to perfection both the Jewish Law or Torah (Greek: nomos) and Greek philosophy, with its emphasis on the idea of the “word” (Greek: logos). Of particular interest is the Logos Christology which Justin developed, in which he exploits the apologetic potential of the idea of the logos, current in both Stoicism and the Middle Platonism of the period.

Justin appeals to the contemporary philosophical use of the term logos, generally regarded as the ultimate source of all human knowledge. He argues that the one and the same logos is known by both Christian believers and pagan philosophers; the latter, however, have only partial access to it through the mind, whereas Christians have full access to it, through the mind and in history, on account of its manifestation in Christ. The statement in the fourth gospel that the “word became flesh, and dwelt among us” (John 1: 14) plays a critically important role in Justin's thought. Justin allows that pre-Christian secular philosophers, such as Heraclitus and Socrates, thus had partial access to the truth, because of the manner in which the logos is present in the world.

An idea of especial importance in this context is that of the logos spermatikos (Greek: “seed-bearing logos”), which appears to derive from Middle Platonism. According to this idea, the divine Logos (Jesus) sowed seeds throughout human history. It is therefore to be expected that this “seed-bearing logos” can be known, even if only in part, by non-Christians. Justin is therefore able to argue that Christianity builds upon and fulfills the hints and anticipations of God's revelation which are to be had through pagan philosophy. The logos was known temporarily through the theophanies (that is, appearances or manifestations of God) in the Old Testament; Christ brings the logos to its fullest revelation. Justin states this point clearly in his Second Apology:

Our religion is clearly more sublime than any human teaching in this respect: the Christ who has appeared for us human beings represents the Logos principle in all its fullness. [...] Whatever either lawyers or philosophers have said well, was articulated by finding and reflecting upon some aspect of the Logos. However, since they did not know the Logos – which is Christ – in its entirety, they often contradicted themselves.

The world of Greek philosophy is thus set firmly in the context of Christianity: it is a prelude to the coming of Christ, who brings to fulfillment what philosophy had hitherto known only in part.

It is in the writings of Origen (c.185–c.254) that Logos Christology appears to find its fullest development. It must be made clear that Origen's Christology is complex, and that its interpretation at points is highly problematical. What follows is a simplification of his approach. In the incarnation, the human soul of Christ is united with the logos. On account of the closeness of this union, Christ's human soul comes to share in the properties of the logos. Nevertheless, Origen insists that, although both the Logos and Father are coeternal, the Logos is subordinate to the Father.

We noted above that Justin Martyr argued that the logos was accessible to all, even if only in a fragmentary manner, but that its full disclosure only came in Christ. Related ideas can be found in other writers to adopt Logos Christology, including Origen. Origen compares God's act of revelation to being enlightened by the “rays of God,” which are caused by “the light which is the divine Logos.” A knowledge of God is thus possible outside the Christian faith, even though this may take a fragmentary form.

Arius (c.260–336): Jesus Christ as “Supreme Among the Creatures”

This process of exploration of religious and philosophical categories suitable for expressing the significance of Jesus of Nazareth reached a watershed in the fourth century. The controversy which forced the issue was precipitated by Arius, a priest in one of the larger churches in the great Egyptian city of Alexandria. Arius set out his views in a work known as the Thalia (“banquet”), which has not survived in its entirety. As a result, we know Arius's ideas through quotes found in the writings of his opponents. This means that these extracts from his works are presented in isolation, so that we do not fully understand the context in which Arius developed his ideas.

The fundamental themes of Arius's teachings can be summarized in terms of four basic statements, each of which needs a considerable amount of conceptual unpacking.

1. The Son and the Father do not have the same essence (ousia).
2. The Son is a created being (ktisma or poiema), even though he is to be recognized as first and foremost among created beings, in terms of origination and rank.
3. Although the Son was the creator of the worlds, and must therefore have existed before them and before all time, there was nevertheless a time when the Son did not exist.
4. The term “Son of God” is thus a metaphor, an honorific term intended to underscore the rank of the Son among other creatures. It does not imply that Father and Son share the same being or status.

One of the outcomes of the Arian controversy was the recognition of the futility, even theological illegitimacy, of biblical “proof-texting” – the simplistic practice of believing that a theological debate can be settled by quoting a few passages from the Bible. Arius's theological position was clearly grounded on biblical texts. For example, Proverbs 8: 22 speaks of God possessing wisdom at the beginning of creation. Christ is also described by Paul as the “first born” of the redeemed (Romans 8: 29). The point is that Arius chose to interpret these texts in a different manner from his orthodox opponents. Both sides of the Arian controversy were able to amass biblical texts which seemed to support their cases. The real question concerned the overall picture disclosed by the New Testament. Indeed, the Arian controversy can be argued to be about how an ensemble of relevant biblical texts is to be integrated, in that each side had no difficulty in identifying individual texts which supported their position. Identifying the overall pattern disclosed by those texts proved to be the decisive issue.

The most fundamental Arian belief was that Jesus Christ was not divine in any meaningful sense of the term. He was “first among the creatures” – that is, preeminent in rank, yet unquestionably a creature rather than divine. Christ, as Logos, was indeed the agent of the creation of the world, as stated in the Prologue to John's gospel. Yet the Logos was itself created by God for this purpose. The Father is thus to be regarded as existing before the Son. “There was a time when he was not.” This statement places Father and Son on different levels, and is consistent with Arius's rigorous insistence that the Son is a creature. Only the Father is “unbegotten”; the Son, like all other creatures, derives from this one source of being.

Arius was careful to emphasize that the Son is not like every other creature. There is a distinction of rank between the Son and other creatures, including human beings. Arius has some difficulty in identifying the precise nature of this distinction. The Son, he argued, is “a perfect creature, yet not as one among other creatures; a begotten being, yet not as one among other begotten beings.” The implication seems to be that the Son outranks other creatures while sharing their essentially created and begotten nature.

Arius thus draws an absolute distinction between God and the created order. There are no intermediate or hybrid species. For Arius, God was totally transcendent and immutable. So how could such a God enter into history and become incarnate? As a creature, the Son was changeable (Greek: treptos). For Arius, this was inconsistent with the notion of an immutable God. Furthermore, the notion that God the Son was divine seemed to compromise the fundamental themes of monotheism and the unity of God – themes which, of course, would re-emerge as central in early Islam.

The utter transcendence and inaccessibility of God meant that God cannot be known by any other creature. Since Arius holds that the Son is to be regarded as a creature, however elevated above all other creatures, it therefore follows that the Son cannot know the Father. “The one who has a beginning is in no position to comprehend or lay hold of the one who has no beginning.” In common with all other creatures, the Son is dependent upon the grace of God to perform whatever function has been ascribed to him.

Arius thus affirmed the humanity of Jesus of Nazareth, declaring that he was supreme among the creatures. Like Ebionitism, Arius declined to accept that Jesus could be said to be divine in any meaningful sense of the term. Yet Ebionitism set out to interpret the significance of Jesus within the framework of existing Jewish models of divine presence within humanity, particularly the notion of a prophet or spirit-filled individual. Arius, in contrast, sought to accommodate Jesus of Nazareth within the frameworks made available by the strict Greek philosophical monotheisms of his age, which precluded any notion of the incarnation as inconsistent with the changelessness and transcendence of God. Ebionitism and Arianism may appear to say similar things, but they begin from very different starting points and are guided by significantly different assumptions.

It is sometimes suggested that Arius developed his position on the identity of Jesus of Nazareth on the basis of a preconceived philosophical position which declared that, as a matter of principle, God could not become incarnate. There is some truth in this point, but not quite the whole truth. Arius's concerns were partly apologetic, in that he clearly believed that many were being alienated from Christianity on account of its increasing emphasis upon an idea – the incarnation – which educated Greeks were unable to accept. Arius saw his approach to Christianity, in contrast, as representing a measured and judicious amalgam of philosophical sophistication and responsible biblical exegesis.

Athanasius (c.293–373): Jesus Christ as God Incarnate

So why did this strongly rational approach to the identity of Jesus of Nazareth attract such vigorous criticism? Arius's most indefatigable critic was Athanasius of Alexandria. For Athanasius, Arius had destroyed the internal coherence of the Christian faith, rupturing the close connection between Christian belief and worship. There are two points of particular importance that underlie Athanasius's critique of Arius.

First, Athanasius argues that it is only God who can save. God, and God alone, can break the power of sin, and bring humanity to eternal life. The fundamental characteristic of human nature is that it requires to be redeemed. No creature can save another creature. Only the creator can redeem the creation. If Christ is not God, he is part of the problem, not its solution.

Having emphasized that it is God alone who can save, Athanasius then makes the logical move which the Arians found difficult to counter. The New Testament and the Christian liturgical tradition alike regard Jesus Christ as Savior. Yet, as Athanasius emphasized, only God can save. So how are we to make sense of this? The only possible solution, Athanasius argues, is to accept that Jesus is God incarnate.

1. No creature can redeem another creature.
2. According to Arius, Jesus Christ is a creature.
3. Therefore, according to Arius, Jesus Christ cannot redeem humanity.

Arius was firmly committed to the idea that Christ was the savior of humanity; Athanasius did not suggest that Arius denied this idea, but that he rendered it incoherent. If Christ was merely “supreme among the creatures,” he was unable to be the savior of humanity. If Christ were only a human being, no matter how distinguished, he would be part of the problem, not its solution. Salvation, for Athanasius, involves divine intervention. Athanasius thus draws out the meaning of John 1: 14 by arguing that the “Word became flesh”: in other words, God entered into our human situation, in order to change it. This idea is developed in Athanasius's classic work “On the Incarnation,” in which he declares that “the human race would have perished completely had not the Lord and Savior of all, the Son of God, come among us to put an end to death.” For Athanasius, God became a human being in the incarnation, in order that human beings might become divine.

The second point that Athanasius makes is that Christians worship and pray to Jesus Christ. This pattern can be traced back to the New Testament itself, and is of considerable importance in clarifying early Christian understandings of the significance of Jesus of Nazareth. By the fourth century, prayer to and adoration of Christ were standard features of Christian public worship. Athanasius argues that, if Jesus Christ was a creature, Christians were guilty of worshiping a creature instead of God – in other words, they had lapsed into idolatry. Did not the Old Testament law explicitly prohibit the worship of anyone or anything other than God? Arius was not in disagreement with the practice of worshiping Jesus; he refused, however, to draw the same conclusions as Athanasius.

The point at issue here is the relationship between Christian worship and Christian belief. Orthodoxy maintains a view of the identity of Jesus Christ which is completely consistent with the worship patterns of the church. Christians, Athanasius argued, were right to worship and adore Jesus Christ, because by doing so they were recognizing him for what he really was – God incarnate. If Christ were not God, it would be totally improper to worship him. If Arius was right, existing patterns of Christian worship would have to be drastically altered, breaking the link with the earliest forms of Christian prayer and adoration. Arius seemed to be guilty of making the traditional way in which Christians prayed and worshiped incoherent. Though affirming the tradition of worshipping Jesus, Arius had undermined its integrity. If Arius was correct, Christians ought not to adore or pray to Christ in this way. Christ could be honored as “first among the creatures”; he should not, however, be worshiped.

We see here the fundamental characteristic of heresy: the maintenance of the outward appearance of faith coupled with the subversion of its inward identity. To focus only on the two points we have considered, Arius affirmed that Christ was the savior of humanity and that the church should worship him, yet interpreted his identity in such a manner that neither salvation nor adoration were proper. Such a clear tension between theology and practice could not be sustained for long without causing their rupture.

The Arian controversy had to be settled somehow, if peace was to be established within the church. Debate came to center upon two terms as possible descriptions of the relation of the Father to the Son. The Greek term homoiousios, “of similar substance” or “of like being,” was seen by some as representing a judicious compromise, allowing the proximity between Father and Son to be asserted without requiring any further speculation on the precise nature of their relationship. However, the rival term homoousios, “of the same substance” or “of the same being,” eventually gained the upper hand. Though differing by only one letter from the alternative term, it embodied a very different understanding of the relationship between Father and Son. The fury of the debate prompted Edmund Gibbon (1737–94) to comment in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–88) that never had so much energy been spent over a single vowel. The Nicene Creed – or, more accurately, the Niceno–Constantinopolitan Creed – of 381 declared that Christ was “of the same substance” with the Father. This affirmation has since come to be widely regarded as a benchmark of Christological orthodoxy within all the mainstream Christian churches, whether Protestant, Catholic, or Orthodox.

In turning to deal with Athanasius's response to Arius, we have begun to touch upon some of the features of the Alexandrian school of Christology. It is therefore appropriate now to explore these in more detail, and compare them with the views of the rival school of Antioch.

The Alexandrian School: Apollinarianism and its Critics

The outlook of the Alexandrian school, of which Athanasius was a leading representative, focuses sharply on the significance of Christ as savior (Greek: soter) of humanity. Jesus Christ redeems humanity by taking human beings up into the life of God, or making them divine, traditionally expressed in terms of “deification.” Christology gives expression to what this soteriological insight implies. Or, to put this another way, the identity of Jesus of Nazareth is disclosed through the saving actions of Jesus of Nazareth.

We could summarize the trajectory of Alexandrian Christology along the following lines: if human nature is to be deified, it must be united with the divine nature. God must become united with human nature in such a manner that the latter is enabled to share in the life of God. This, the Alexandrians argued, was precisely what had happened in and through the incarnation of the Son of God in Jesus Christ. The second person of the Trinity assumed human nature, and by doing so ensured its divinization. God became human in order that humanity might become divine.

Alexandrian writers thus placed considerable emphasis upon the idea of the Logos assuming human nature. The term “assuming” is important; a distinction is drawn between the Logos “dwelling within humanity” (as in the case of the Old Testament prophets) and the Logos taking human nature upon itself (as in the incarnation of the Son of God). Particular emphasis came to be placed upon John 1: 14 (“the Word became flesh”), which came to embody the fundamental insights of the school, and the liturgical celebration of Christmas. To celebrate the birth of Christ was to celebrate the coming of the Logos to the world and its taking human nature upon itself in order to redeem it.

This clearly raised the question of the relationship between the divinity and humanity of Christ. Cyril of Alexandria (c.378–444) is one of many writers within the school to emphasize the reality of their union in the incarnation. The Logos existed “without flesh” before its union with human nature; after that union, there is only one nature, in that the Logos united human nature with itself. This emphasis upon the one nature of Christ distinguishes the Alexandrian from the Antiocheneschool, which was more receptive to the idea of two natures within Christ. Cyril states this point as follows:

In declaring that the Word [Logos] was made to “be incarnate” and “made human,” we do not assert that there was any change in the nature of the Word when it became flesh, or that it was transformed into an entire human being, consisting of soul and body; but we say that the Word, in an indescribable and inconceivable manner, united personally to himself flesh endowed with a rational soul, and thus became a human being and was called the Son of man. And this was not by a mere act of will or favor, nor simply adopting a role or taking to himself a person.

This raised the question of what kind of human nature had been assumed by the Logos. Apollinarius of Laodicea (c.310–c.390) had anxieties about the increasingly widespread belief that the Logos had assumed human nature in its entirety. It seemed to him that this implied that the Logos was contaminated by the weaknesses of human nature. How could the Son of God be allowed to be tainted by purely human directive principles? The sinlessness of Christ would be compromised, in Apollinarius's view, if he were to possess a purely human mind; was not the human mind the source of sin and rebellion against God? Only if the human mind were to be replaced by a purely divine motivating and directing force could the sinlessness of Christ be maintained. For this reason, Apollinarius argued that, in Christ, a purely human mind and soul were replaced by a divine mind and soul. “The divine energy fulfills the role of the animating soul and of the human mind” in Christ. The human nature of Christ is thus incomplete.

This idea appalled many of Apollinarius's colleagues. The Apollinarian view of Christ may have had its attractions for some; others, however, were shocked by its soteriological implications. How could human nature be redeemed, it was asked, if only part of human nature had been assumed by the Logos? Perhaps the most famous statement of this position was made by Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89), who stressed the redemptive importance of the assumption of human nature in its totality at the incarnation:

If anyone has put their trust in him as a human being lacking a human mind, they are themselves mindless and not worthy of salvation. For what has not been assumed has not been healed; it is what is united to his divinity that is saved. [...] Let them not grudge us our total salvation, or endue the Savior only with the bones and nerves and mere appearance of humanity.

The Antiochene School: Theodore of Mopsuestia (c.350–428)

The school of Christology that arose in Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey) differed considerably from its Egyptian rival at Alexandria. One of the most significant points of difference relates to the context in which Christological speculation was set. The Alexandrian writers were motivated primarily by soteriological considerations. Concerned that deficient understandings of the person of Christ were linked with inadequate conceptions of salvation, they used ideas derived from secular Greek philosophy to ensure a picture of Christ that was consistent with the full redemption of humanity. As we have seen, the idea of the Logos was of particular importance, especially when linked with the notion of incarnation.

The Antiochene writers took a very different perspective at this point. Their concerns were primarily moral rather than purely soteriological, and they drew much less significantly on the ideas of Greek philosophy. The basic trajectory of much Antiochene thinking on the identity of Christ can be traced along the following lines. On account of their disobedience, human beings exist in a state of corruption, from which they are unable to extricate themselves. If redemption is to take place, it must be on the basis of a new obedience on the part of humanity. Since humanity is unable to break free from the bonds of sin, God is obliged to intervene. This leads to the coming of the redeemer as one who unites humanity and divinity, and thus to the re-establishment of an obedient people of God.

The two natures of Christ are vigorously defended. Christ is at one and the same time both God and a real individual human being. Against the Alexandrian criticism that this was to deny the unity of Christ, the Antiochenes responded that they upheld that unity while simultaneously recognizing that the one redeemer possessed both a perfect human and a perfect divine nature. There is a “perfect conjunction” between the human and divine natures in Christ. The complete unity of Christ is thus not inconsistent with his possessing two natures, divine and human. Theodore of Mopsuestia stressed this point, asserting that the glory of Jesus Christ “comes from God the Logos, who assumed him and united him to himself. [...] And because of this exact conjunction which this human being has with God the Son, the whole creation honors and worships him.” The Alexandrians remained suspicious; this seemed to amount to a doctrine of “two sons” – that is, that Jesus Christ was not a single person but two, one human and one divine. Yet this option is explicitly excluded by the leading writers of the school, such as Nestorius (c.386–c.451), archbishop of Constantinople. Christ is, according to Nestorius, “the common name of the two natures”:

Christ is indivisible in that he is Christ, but he is twofold in that he is both God and a human being. He is one in his sonship, but is twofold in that which takes and that which is taken. [...] For we do not acknowledge two Christs or two sons or “only-begottens” or Lords; not one son and another son, not a first “only-begotten” and a new “only-begotten,” not a first and second Christ, but one and the same.

So how did the Antiochene theologians envisage the mode of union of divine and human natures in Christ? We have already seen the “assumption” model which had gained the ascendancy at Alexandria, by which the Logos assumed human flesh. What model was employed at Antioch? The answer could be summarized as follows:

- Alexandria: Logos assumes a general human nature.
- Antioch: Logos assumes a specific human being.

Theodore of Mopsuestia is a good example of an Antiochene theologian who held that the Logos did not assume “human nature” in general but a specific human being. Theodore appears to suggest that, instead of assuming a general or abstract human nature, the Logos assumed a specific concrete human individual. This seems to be the case in his work On the Incarnation: “In coming to indwell, the Logos united the assumed [human being] as a whole to itself and made him to share with it in all the dignity in which the one who indwells, being the Son of God by nature, possesses.”

So how are the human and divine natures related? Antiochene writers were convinced that the Alexandrian position led to the “mingling” or “confusion” of the divine and human natures of Christ. To avoid this error, they devised a manner of conceptualizing the relationship between the two natures which maintained their distinct identities. This “union according to good pleasure” involves the human and divine natures of Christ being understood to be rather like watertight compartments within Christ. They never interact or mingle with one another. They remain distinct, being held together by the good pleasure of God. The “hypostatic union” – that is, the union of the divine and human natures in Christ – rests in the will of God.

This might seem to suggest that Theodore of Mopsuestia regarded the union of the divine and human natures as being a purely moral union, like that of a husband and wife. It also leads to a suspicion that the Logos merely puts on human nature, as one would put on a coat: the action involved is temporary and reversible, and involves no fundamental change to anyone involved. However, the Antiochene writers do not seem to have intended these conclusions to be drawn. Perhaps the most reliable way of approaching their position is to suggest that their desire to avoid confusing the divine and human natures within Christ led them to stress their distinctiveness – yet, in so doing, to inadvertently weaken their link in the hypostatic union.

The “Communication of Attributes”

An issue of major concern to many patristic writers centered on the question of the “communication of attributes,” a notion often discussed in terms of the Latin phrase communicatio idiomatum. By the end of the fourth century, the following propositions had gained widespread acceptance within the church:

1. Jesus is fully human.
2. Jesus is fully divine.

If both these statements are simultaneously true, it was argued, what was true of the humanity of Jesus must also be true of his divinity, and vice versa. An example might be the following:

1. Jesus Christ is God.
2. Mary gave birth to Jesus.
3. Therefore Mary is the Mother of God.

This kind of argument became increasingly commonplace within the late fourth-century church; indeed, it often served as a means of testing the orthodoxy of a theologian. A failure to agree that Mary was the “mother of God” became seen as tantamount to a refusal to accept the divinity of Christ.

But how far can this principle be pressed? For example, consider the following line of argument:

1. Jesus suffered on the cross.
2. Jesus is God.
3. Therefore God suffered on the cross.

The first two statements are clearly orthodox and commanded widespread assent within the church. But the third statement represents a conclusion drawn from those orthodox statements that was widely regarded as unacceptable and unorthodox, as we noted in our earlier discussion of the idea of “a suffering God” (pp. 181–5).

It was axiomatic to most patristic writers that God could not suffer. The patristic period witnessed much agonizing over the limits that could be set to this approach. Thus, Gregory of Nazianzus insisted that God must be considered to suffer; otherwise the reality of the incarnation of the Son of God was called into question. However, it was the Nestorian controversy that highlighted the importance of the issues.

By the time of Nestorius, the title theotokos (literally, “bearer of God”) had become widely accepted within both popular piety and academic theology. Nestorius was, however, alarmed at its implications. It seemed to deny the humanity of Christ. Why not call Mary anthropotokos (“bearer of humanity”) or even Christotokos (“bearer of the Christ”)? His suggestions were met with outrage and indignation, on account of the enormous theological investment on the part of Alexandrian theologians in the term theotokos.

Modern scholarship has called into question whether Nestorianism really was heretical, as some Alexandrian writers suggested, pointing out the highly politicized nature of the debate. Nestorius is increasingly regarded as making an entirely legitimate point, thus opening up an important theological discussion. The Antiochene defense of the humanity of Jesus Christ did not entail the rejection of his divinity. When Nestorius and others within this tradition emphasized that Jesus of Nazareth had to develop in moral goodness, and had to achieve his victory over sin as a human being, this was to be seen as a supplementation and enrichment of the accompanying belief that he was also divine. The scholarly review of the theological status of “Nestorianism” calls into question many judgments made by writers of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and readers should be aware of this significant change in attitudes if they are consulting older accounts of this debate.

The Council of Chalcedon (451)

We conclude our analysis of the formative patristic development of Christology by looking at the definition of the Council of Chalcedon, widely regarded as a landmark in early Christian theology.

We all with one voice confess our Lord Jesus Christ to be one and the same Son, perfect in divinity and humanity, truly God and truly human, consisting of a rational soul and a body, being of one substance with the Father in relation to his divinity, and being of one substance with us in relation to his humanity, and is like us in all things apart from sin. (Hebrews 4: 15)

This statement affirms the core themes of the doctrine of the incarnation. Jesus Christ is “truly God and truly human,” being of “one substance” with God in relation to his divinity, and of “one substance” with us in relation to his humanity. This can be interpreted in terms of both the Alexandrian and Antiochene approaches, noted earlier (pp. 220–3). Chalcedon was clearly interested in laying down what really mattered while allowing a degree of latitude over how the core themes of orthodoxy were to be interpreted.

As Karl Rahner (1904–84) pointed out in a landmark essay of 1951, marking the 1,500th anniversary of the Council of Chalcedon, the definitions of the Council were to be seen not only as an end but also as a beginning. In “Chalcedon: End or Beginning?,” Rahner noted that Chalcedon brought the patristic Christological debates to a conclusion, resolving some of the impasses that had arisen. Yet it also marked a beginning, in that Chalcedon did not lay down a timeless archetype to which all future theology must conform but rather provided a prototype which could serve as the basis for future discussion and interpretation. Rahner's point is important to those who find Chalcedon's use of Greek metaphysical categories – such as “substance” – unhelpful, as he stresses to later generations the need for a continuing process of interpretation of these ideas.

An important minority viewpoint must, however, be noted. Chalcedon did not succeed in establishing a consensus throughout the entire Christian world. A dissenting position became established during the sixth century, and is now generally known as “miaphysitism” – literally, the view that there is “only one nature” (Greek: mia, “only one,” and physis, “nature”) in Christ. (The term “monophysitism” is also encountered but refers primarily to the views of Eutyches of Constantinople, c.380–c.456.) The “one nature” in question is understood to be divine, rather than human. The intricacies of this viewpoint lie beyond the scope of this volume; the reader should note that it remains normative within most Christian churches of the eastern Mediterranean world, including the Abyssinian, Armenian, Coptic, and Syrian churches. (The rival Chalcedonian position, which recognized two natures in Christ, one human and the other divine, is occasionally referred to as “dyophysitism,” from the Greek terms for “two” and “natures.”)

We now move away from the patristic Christological debates and consider some developments during the Middle Ages.

Medieval Christology: The Relationship Between the Incarnation and the Fall

The medieval period was noted for its systematic exploration of the logical and philosophical aspects of most areas of theology, and Christology was no exception. Anselm of Canterbury's (c.1033–1109) treatise “Why God became Man” explored the rationality of the incarnation, focusing especially on the importance of the death of Christ. Yet other discussions took place during this important period in theological history. To illustrate the kinds of debate that took place at this time, we shall consider a theological question concerning the incarnation that intrigued this era. Was the incarnation dependent on Adam's fall – or would it have happened anyway?

The classical understanding of the grounds of the incarnation could be summarized like this: humanity fell from grace and required restoration. This restoration required the incarnation of the Son of God, and his saving work on the cross. Therefore, if humanity had not sinned, there would have been no need for the incarnation. In fact, most Christian writers thought it pointless to speculate about what might have happened if Adam had never sinned. But not all.

Honorius of Autun (1080–1154), who was active as a theologian over the period 1106–35, argued that the incarnation was not ordained as a remedy for human sin but in order to secure the divinization of humanity. And humanity needed to be made divine, whether it remained innocent or whether it fell. As humanity required to be totally transformed in this way, the incarnation was necessary. “It was necessary, therefore, for [the Son of God] to become incarnate, so that humanity could be deified, and thus it does not follow that sin was the cause of the incarnation.” A similar view is found in the writings of the Benedictine theologian Rupert of Deutz (c.1075–1130), who argued that the incarnation was the result of God's wish to dwell among his people. The incarnation can therefore be seen as the climax of the work of creation, rather than a reaction to human sin.

It fell to Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) to adjudicate on this debate. Clearly uneasy about the highly speculative nature of the question, he argued that the coming of Christ was the result of the fall, and declared that there was little to be gained by considering alternatives:

Some say that the Son of God would have become incarnate, even if humanity had not sinned. Others assert the opposite, and it would seem that our assent ought to be given to this opinion. For those things that originate from God's will, lying beyond what is due to the creature, can only be made known to us through being revealed in Holy Scripture, in which the divine will is made known to us. Therefore, since the sin of the first human being is described as the cause of the incarnation throughout Holy Scripture, it is more in accordance with this to say that the work of the incarnation was ordained as a remedy for sin, so that, if sin had not existed, the incarnation would never have taken place. Yet the power of God is not limited in this way. Even if sin had not existed, God could still have become incarnate.

We now turn to consider some of the major themes in contemporary discussion of the identity and significance of Jesus Christ. In two later sections, we shall consider the debates about “faith and history,” focusing on the famous “Quest for the Historical Jesus.”

The Relationship Between the Person and Work of Christ

Older works of Christian theology often draw a sharp distinction between “the person of Christ” or “Christology,” on the one hand, and “the work of Christ” or “soteriology,” on the other. This distinction is maintained in this present work, for purely educational reasons, in that a full discussion of both areas could not be contained within the limits of a single chapter. However, the distinction is increasingly regarded as being unhelpful, save for presentational reasons.

Theologically, the close connection between the two areas is now generally recognized. Among the considerations which led to this development, the following two are of especial importance.

First, the philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) drew a famous distinction between the Ding-an-sich (“thing in itself”) and the human perception of this thing. Kant's argument is that we cannot know things directly but only insofar as we can perceive them or apprehend their impact. Although the ultimate philosophical justification of this assertion lies beyond the scope of this volume (and is, in any case, questionable), its theological implications are clear: the identity of Jesus is known through his impact upon us. In other words, the person of Christ becomes known through his work. There is thus an organic link between Christology and soteriology. This is the approach adopted by Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl in his Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation (1874). Ritschl argued that it was improper to separate Christology and soteriology since we perceive “the nature and attributes, that is the determination of being, only in the effect of a thing upon us, and we think of the nature and extent of its effect upon us as its essence.”

The second consideration is the growing realization of the affinities between functional and ontological Christologies – that is, between Christologies that make affirmations about the function or work of Christ and those that make affirmations concerning his identity or being. To put it simply: there is a robust link between who Jesus Christ is and what he does.

Athanasius was one of the earliest Christian writers to make this connection explicit. Only God can save, he asserts. Yet Christ is the savior of humanity. What does this statement concerning the function of Christ tell us about his identity? If Jesus Christ is capable of functioning as savior, who must he be? Christology and soteriology are thus seen as two sides of the same coin rather than two independent areas of thought.

This point was also made by Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–2014), who stressed the way in which Christology and soteriology have had the closest of connections in Christian thinking:

The divinity of Jesus and his freeing and redeeming significance for us are related in the closest possible way. To this extent, Melancthon's famous sentence is appropriate: "Who Jesus Christ is becomes known in his saving action." [...] Since Schleiermacher the close tie between Christology and soteriology has won general acceptance in theology: This is particularly to be seen in one characteristic feature of modern Christology. One no longer separates the divine-human person and the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, as was done in medieval Scholastic theology and, in its wake, in the dogmatics of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Protestant orthodoxy, but rather, with Schleiermacher, both are conceived as two sides of the same thing.

The importance of this point can be seen by comparing a style of Christology which stresses the humanity of Christ (especially in relation to his moral example: see p. 233) with a Pelagian soteriology (which stresses the total freedom of the human will: see pp. 330–4). For Pelagius (c.354–c.420), humanity had the ability to do right; it merely needed to be told what to do. The moral example of Christ provided this example. This exemplarist view of Christ is thus linked with a view of human nature which minimizes the extent of human sin, and the strange and tragic history of humanity in general. As the English theologian Charles Gore (1853–1932) pointed out incisively over a century ago, in an oft-quoted passage:

Inadequate conceptions of Christ's person go hand in hand with inadequate conceptions of what human nature wants. The Nestorian conception of Christ [...] qualifies Christ for being an example of what man can do, and into what wonderful union with God he can be assumed if he is holy enough; but Christ remains one man among many, shut in within the limits of a single human personality, and influencing man only from outside. He can be a Redeemer of man if man can be saved from outside by bright example, but not otherwise. The Nestorian Christ is logically associated with the Pelagian man. [...] The Nestorian Christ is the fitting Saviour of the Pelagian man.

As will be clear from our earlier discussion of the views of Nestorius, we need to note that modern theological scholarship would no longer agree with Gore's characterization of a "Nestorian" Christology, nor his purely negative assessment of this approach (pp. 223–4). Yet Gore's general point remains important, in that a significant connection is established between Christology and soteriology. An exemplarist soteriology, with its associated understanding of the nature and role of the moral example of Jesus Christ, is ultimately the correlative of a Pelagian view of the situation and abilities of humanity. The ontological gap between Christ and ourselves is contracted, in order to minimize the discontinuity between his moral personality and ours. Christ is the supreme human example, who evinces an authentically human lifestyle which we are alleged to be capable of imitating. Our view of who Jesus Christ is ultimately reflects our understanding of the situation of fallen humanity.

Christological Models: Classical and Contemporary

One of the perennial tasks of Christian theology has been the clarification of the relationship between human and divine elements in the person of Jesus Christ. The Council of Chalcedon (451) may be regarded as laying down a controlling principle for classical Christology which has been accepted as definitive within much Christian theology. The principle in question could be summarized like this: provided that it is recognized that Jesus Christ is both truly divine and truly human, the precise manner in which this is articulated or explored is not of fundamental importance. As Karl Rahner pointed out, Chalcedon did not close down Christological reflection but provided it with a new framework. The Oxford patristic scholar Maurice F. Wiles (1923–2005) summarized Chalcedon's aims and legacy as follows:

On the one hand was the conviction that a saviour must be fully divine; on the other was the conviction that what is not assumed is not healed. Or, to put the matter in other words, the source of salvation must be God; the locus of salvation must be humanity. It is quite clear that these two principles often pulled in opposite directions. The Council of Chalcedon was the church's attempt to resolve, or perhaps rather to agree to live with, that tension. Indeed, to accept both principles as strongly as did the early church is already to accept the Chalcedonian faith.

In part, Chalcedon's decision to insist upon the two natures of Christ, while accepting a plurality of interpretations regarding their relation, reflects the political situation of the period. At a time when there was considerable disagreement within the church over the most reliable way of stating the "two natures of Christ," the Council was obliged to adopt a realistic approach and to give its weight to whatever consensus it could find. That consensus concerned the recognition that Christ was both divine and human, but not how the divine and human natures related to each other.

As Christian theology has expanded into a variety of different cultural contexts, and adopted various philosophical systems as vehicles for theological exploration, it is no cause for surprise that a variety of ways of exploring the relationship between the human and divine natures of Christ can be found within the Christian tradition. In what follows, we shall explore some of these approaches.

The Substantial Presence of God in Christ

The doctrine of the incarnation affirms the presence of the divine nature or substance within Christ. The divine nature assumes human nature in the incarnation. As we noted earlier, patristic writers within the Alexandrian school referred to Mary as the theotokos – that is, “bearer of God” – as a way of asserting the reality of the union of divine and human substances in the incarnation.

The notion of a substantial presence of God within Christ was of vital importance to the Christian church in its controversy with Gnosticism. A central Gnostic notion was that matter was evil and sinful, so that redemption was a purely spiritual affair. Irenaeus links the idea of a substantial presence of God in Christ with the symbolic affirmation of this in the bread and wine of the Eucharist:

If the flesh is not saved, then the Lord did not redeem us with his blood, the cup of the Eucharist is not a sharing in his blood, and the bread which we break is not a sharing in his body. For the blood cannot exist apart from veins and flesh and the rest of the human substance which the divine Logos truly became, in order to redeem us.

This understanding of Christology is closely linked with the image of salvation as “deification.” Simeon the New Theologian (949–1022) brought this point out particularly clearly, as he reflected on the union of the human soul with God:

But your nature is your essence, and your essence your nature. So uniting with your body, I share in your nature, and I truly take as mine what is yours, uniting with your divinity. [...] You have made me a god, a mortal by my nature, a god by your grace, by the power of your Spirit, bringing together as god a unity of opposites.

We shall return to this concept later, in the course of our discussion of the nature of salvation (see p. 271).

The idea of a substantial presence of God in Christ became of particular importance within Byzantine theology and formed one of the theological foundations of the practice of portraying God using images – or, to use the more technical term, icons (Greek: eikon, “image”). There had always been resistance to this practice within the eastern church, on account of that church's emphasis upon the ineffability and transcendence of God. The “apophatic” tradition in theology sought to preserve the mystery of God by stressing the divine unknowability. The veneration of icons appeared to be totally inconsistent with this, and seemed to many to be dangerously close to paganism. In any case, did not the Old Testament forbid the worship of images?

Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople from 715 to 730, argued vigorously for the use of icons in public worship and private devotion on the basis of the following incarnational argument. “I represent God, the invisible one, not as invisible, but insofar as God has become visible for us by participation in flesh and blood.” A similar approach was taken by John of Damascus (c.676–749), who argued that, in worshiping icons, he was not worshiping any created object as such but the creator God who had chosen to redeem humanity through the material order:

Previously there was absolutely no way in which God, who has neither a body nor a face, could be represented by any image. But now that he has made himself visible in the flesh and has lived with people, I can make an image of what I have seen of God [...] and contemplate the glory of the Lord, his face having been unveiled.

This position was regarded as untenable by the “iconoclastic” party (so called because they wanted to break or destroy icons). To portray God in an image was to imply that God could be described or defined – and that was to imply an unthinkable limitation on the part of God. Aspects of this debate can still be discerned within the Greek and Russian Orthodox churches, where the veneration of icons remains an integral element of spirituality.

In more recent times, the idea of the incarnation as God's substantial presence has been used as the basis for emphasizing the importance of relating the Christian faith to cultural contexts through becoming “incarnate” within culture. This point was made particularly clearly by Pope Francis (born 1936), in his 2013 apostolic exhortation Evangelii Gaudium (“The Joy of the Gospel”):

Realities are greater than ideas. This principle has to do with incarnation of the word and its being put into practice: “By this you know the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is from God” (1 John 4: 2). The principle of reality, of a word already made flesh and constantly striving to take flesh anew, is essential to evangelization. It helps us to see that the Church's history is a history of salvation, to be mindful of those saints who inculturated the Gospel in the life of our peoples and to reap the fruits of the Church's rich bimillennial tradition, without pretending to come up with a system of thought detached from this treasury, as if we wanted to reinvent the Gospel.

Christ as Mediator Between God and Humanity

A major strand of Christological reflection concentrates upon the notion of mediation between God and humanity. The New Testament refers to Christ as a mediator at several points (1 Timothy 2: 5; Hebrews 9: 15), thus lending weight to the notion that the presence of God in Christ is intended to mediate between a transcendent God and fallen humanity. This idea of “presence as mediation” takes two quite distinct, yet ultimately complementary, forms: the mediation of revelation, on the one hand, and of salvation, on the other.

The Logos Christology of Justin Martyr and others is an excellent instance of the notion of the mediation of revelation through Christ. Here, the logos is understood to be a mediating principle which bridges the gap between a transcendent God and God's creation. Although present in a transient manner in the Old Testament prophets, the logos becomes incarnate in Christ, thus providing a fixed point of mediation between God and humanity. A related approach is found in The Mediator (1927), by Emil Brunner (1889–1966), and in a more developed form in his 1937 work Truth as Encounter. In the latter, Brunner argued that faith was primarily a personal encounter with the God who meets us personally in Jesus Christ. Brunner was convinced that the early church had misunderstood revelation as the divine impartation of doctrinal truth about God, rather than the self-revelation of God. For Brunner, “truth” is itself a personal concept. Revelation cannot be conceived propositionally or intellectually, but must be understood as an act of God, and supremely the act of Jesus Christ.

God is revealed personally and historically in Jesus Christ (pp. 230–1). The concept of “truth as encounter” thus conveys the two elements of a correct understanding of revelation: it is historical and it is personal. By the former, Brunner wishes us to understand that truth is not something permanent within the eternal world of ideas which is disclosed or communicated to us, but something which happens in space and time. Truth comes into being as the act of God in time and space. By the latter point, Brunner intends to emphasize that the content of this act of God is none other than God, rather than a complex of ideas or doctrines concerning God. The revelation of God is God's self-impartation to us. In revelation, God communicates God, not ideas about God – and this communication is concentrated and focused in the person of Jesus Christ as appropriated by the Holy Spirit. Although Brunner's rejection of any cognitive dimension to revelation seems overstated, a significant point is being made, with important Christological implications.

A more strongly soteriological approach to this issue is best seen in the Institutes (1559) by John Calvin (1509–64), in which the person of Christ is interpreted in terms of the mediation of salvation from God to humanity. Christ is, in effect, seen as a unique channel or focus, through which God's redeeming work is directed toward and made available to humanity. Humanity, as originally created by God, was originally good in every respect. On account of the Fall, natural human gifts and faculties have been radically impaired. As a consequence, both human reason and the human will are contaminated by sin. Unbelief is thus seen as an act of will as much as an act of reason; it is not simply a failure to discern the hand of God within the created order but a deliberate decision not to discern it and not to obey God.

Calvin develops the consequences of this at two distinct, although related, levels. At the epistemic level, humans lack the necessary rational and volitional resources to discern God fully within the created order. There are obvious parallels here with the Logos Christology of Justin Martyr. At the soteriological level, humans lack what is required in order to be saved; they do not want to be saved (on account of the debilitation of the mind and will through sin), and they are incapable of saving themselves (in that salvation presupposes obedience to God, now impossible on account of sin). True knowledge of God and salvation must both therefore come from outside the human situation. In such a manner, Calvin lays the foundations for his doctrine of the mediatorship of Jesus Christ.

Jesus Christ is the mediator between God and humanity. In order to act as such a mediator, Jesus Christ must be both divine and human. In that it was impossible for us to ascend to God, on account of our sin, God chose to descend to us instead. Unless Jesus Christ was himself a human being, other human beings could not benefit from his presence or activity. “The Son of God became the Son of Man, and received what is ours in such a way that he transferred to us what is his, making that which is his by nature to become ours through grace” (Calvin).

The Revelational Presence of God in Christ

As we noted earlier, the idea of “revelation” is complex, embracing the idea of a final disclosure or “unveiling” of God at the end of time, as well as the more general and restricted idea of “making God known” (see pp. 136–41). Both these ideas have been of significance in more recent theology, as the notion of a Christologically determined concept of God gained influence in twentieth-century German theology. The Crucified God (1972), by Jürgen Moltmann (born 1926), is an excellent example of a work which seeks to build up an understanding of the nature of God, on the basis of the assumption that God is disclosed through the cross of Christ. In what follows, we shall explore the distinct, though related, approaches to “revelational presence” associated with Karl Barth and Wolfhart Pannenberg.

Karl Barth's Church Dogmatics may be regarded as probably the most extensive and complex exposition of the idea of the “revelational presence of God in Christ.” Barth frequently emphasizes that all theology necessarily possesses an implicit Christological perspective and foundation, which it is the task of theology to make explicit. Barth rejects any deductive Christology based upon a “Christ principle” in favor of one based upon “Jesus Christ himself as witnessed to in Holy Scripture.”

Every theological proposition in the Church Dogmatics may be regarded as Christological, in the sense that the work has its point of departure in Jesus Christ. It is this feature of Barth's later thought that has led to its being described as “Christological concentration” or “Christomonism.” Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88) illustrates this “Christological concentration” by comparing it to an hourglass, in which the sand pours from the upper to the lower section through a constriction. Similarly, the divine revelation proceeds from God to the world, from above to below, only through the central event of the revelation of Christ, apart from which there is no link between God and humanity.

It must be made clear that Barth is not suggesting that the doctrine of either the person or the work of Christ (or both, if they are deemed inseparable) should stand at the center of a Christian dogmatics, nor that a Christological idea or principle should constitute the systematic speculative midpoint of a deductive system. Rather, Barth is arguing that the act of God which is Jesus Christ underlies theology in its totality. A “church dogmatics” must be “Christologically determined,” in that the very possibility and reality of theology is determined by the actuality of the act of divine revelation, by the speaking of the Word of God, by the revelational presence of God in Jesus Christ.

A more eschatological approach is associated with Wolfhart Pannenberg, especially in his 1968 work Jesus: God and Man. For Pannenberg, the resurrection of Christ must be interpreted within the context of the apocalyptic worldview. Within this context, Pannenberg argues, the resurrection of Jesus must be seen as the anticipation of the general resurrection of the dead at the end of time. It thus brings forward into history both that resurrection and other aspects of the apocalyptic expectation of the end-time – including the full and final revelation of God. The resurrection of Jesus is thus organically linked with the self-revelation of God in Christ:

Only at the end of all events can God be revealed in his divinity, that is, as the one who works all things, who has power over everything. Only because in Jesus' resurrection the end of all things, which for us has not yet happened, has already occurred can it be said of Jesus that the ultimate already is present in him, and so also that God himself, his glory, has made its appearance in Jesus in a way that cannot be surpassed. Only because the end of the world is already present in Jesus' resurrection is God himself revealed in him.

The resurrection thus establishes Jesus's identity with God, and allows this identity with God to be read back into his pre-Easter ministry, in terms of a “revelational presence.”

Pannenberg is careful to stress that the “revelation” he has in mind is not simply the “disclosure of facts or statements about God.” He insists upon the notion of self-revelation – a personal revelation which cannot be detached from the person of God. We can only speak of Christ revealing God if there is a revelational presence of God in Christ:

The concept of God's self-revelation contains the idea that the revealer and what is revealed are identical. God is both the subject and content of this self-revelation. To speak of a self-revelation of God in Christ means that the Christ-event, that Jesus, belongs to the essence of God. If this is not the case, then the human event of the life of Jesus would veil the God who is active in that life, and thus exclude the full revelation of God. Self-revelation in the proper sense of the word only takes place where the medium through which God is made known is something that is not alien to God. [...] The concept of self-revelation demands the identity of God with the event that reveals God.

Christ as a Symbolic Presence of God

A related approach treats the traditional Christological formulae as symbols of a presence of God in Christ, which is not to be understood as a substantial presence. This symbolic presence points to the possibility of the same presence being available and accessible to others. Perhaps the most important representative of this position is Paul Tillich (1886–1965), for whom Jesus of Nazareth symbolizes a universal human possibility which can be achieved without specific reference to Jesus.

For Tillich, the event upon which Christianity is based has two aspects: the fact which is called “Jesus of Nazareth” and the reception of this fact by those who claimed him as the Christ. The factual or objective–historical Jesus is not the foundation of faith, apart from his reception as the Christ. Tillich has no interest in the historical figure of Jesus of Nazareth: all that he is prepared to affirm about him (insofar as it relates to the foundation of faith) is that it was a “personal life,” analogous to the biblical picture, of someone who might well have had a name other than “Jesus.” “Whatever his name, the New Being was and is active in this man.”

The symbol “Christ” or “Messiah” means “the one who brings the new state of things, the New Being.” The significance of Jesus lies in his being the historical manifestation of the New Being. “It is the Christ who brings the New Being, who saves men from the old being, that is from existential estrangement and its destructive consequences.” In one personal life, that of Jesus of Nazareth, “essential manhood” has appeared under the conditions of existence without being conquered by them. We are, in effect, presented with a philosophy of existence which attaches itself to the existence of Jesus of Nazareth in the most tenuous of manners, and which would not be significantly disadvantaged if the specific historical individual Jesus of Nazareth did not exist.

Jesus may thus be said to be a symbol which illuminates the mystery of being, although other sources of illumination are available. Tillich here regards Jesus of Nazareth as a symbol of a particular moral or religious principle. Tillich emphasizes that God himself cannot appear under the conditions of existence, in that he is the ground of being. The “New Being” must therefore come from God but cannot be God. Jesus was a human being who achieved a union with God open to every other human being. Tillich thus represents a degree Christology, which treats Jesus as a symbol of our perception of God.

This approach has particular attractions for those committed to interfaith dialogue, such as John Hick (1922–2012) and Paul Knitter (born 1939). On the basis of this approach, Jesus Christ can be treated as one symbol among many others of a universal human possibility – namely, relating to the transcendent, or achieving salvation. Jesus is one symbol of humanity's relationship to the transcendent; others are to be found elsewhere among the world's religions.

Christ as the Bearer of the Holy Spirit

An important way of understanding the presence of God in Christ is by viewing Jesus as the bearer of the Holy Spirit. The roots of this idea lie in the Old Testament, and especially in the notion of charismatic leaders or prophets, endowed and anointed with the gift of the Holy Spirit – a notion we shall consider further in our discussion of the Holy Spirit in the following chapter. In fact, the term “messiah,” as noted above (p. 209), has close links with the idea of “being anointed with the Holy Spirit.” There are excellent reasons for supposing that such an approach to Christology may have become influential in early Palestinian Christianity.

On the basis of what we know of the messianic expectations of first-century Palestine, it may be argued that there was a strong belief in the imminent coming of a bringer of eschatological salvation who would be a bearer of the Spirit of the Lord (Joel 2: 28–32 is of especial importance). Even in his earthly ministry, Jesus appears to have been identified as the one upon whom the Spirit of God rested. The anointing of Jesus with the Spirit at the time of his baptism is of particular importance in this respect. An early approach to this question became known as “adoptionism”; this view, especially associated with Ebionitism, regarded Jesus as an ordinary human being, yet one endowed with special divine charismatic gifts subsequent to his baptism.

The understanding of Jesus as the bearer of the Spirit has proved attractive to many who have difficulty with the classical approaches to Christology. An excellent example is provided by the British patristic scholar G. W. H. Lampe (1912–80). In his God as Spirit (1976), Lampe argued that the particular significance of Jesus of Nazareth resided in his being the bearer of the Spirit of God, and thus an example of a spirit-filled Christian existence, showing “the indwelling presence of God as Spirit in the freely responding spirit of man as this is concretely exhibited in Christ and reproduced in some measure in Christ's followers."

Perhaps a more significant development of this approach may be found in the writings of the German theologian Walter Kasper (born 1933), especially in his Jesus the Christ (1974). Kasper does not have any particular difficulties with classical Christological models. However, he is concerned to ensure that the Holy Spirit is not ignored in a comprehensive account of the identity and theological function of Christ. Kasper therefore argues for a pneumatologically oriented (from the Greek word pneuma, "spirit") Christology, which does justice to the fact that the New Testament often portrays Christ in terms of the central Old Testament concept of the "Spirit of the Lord." For Kasper, the uniqueness of Jesus within the synoptic gospels resides in his spirit-filled existence. Jesus's real identity can only be accounted for in terms of an unprecedented relationship to the Spirit. This Spirit, according to Kasper, is the life-giving power of the creator, who inaugurated the eschatological age of healing and hope.

In Jesus, Kasper sees the Spirit of the Lord at work, effecting a new and unprecedented relationship between God and humanity, a development confirmed and consolidated by the resurrection. In terms of this Spirit Christology, Kasper regards Jesus as the focal point at which the universal saving intention of God becomes a unique historical person. In this way, the Spirit opens up the possibility of others entering into the inner life of God. The same Spirit who permeated the life of Jesus is now made available to others, in order that they might share in the same inner life of God.

An anxiety about this approach has been raised by Wolfhart Pannenberg. In his influential Jesus: God and Man, Pannenberg argues that any Christology which begins from the notion of the presence of the Spirit in Jesus will inevitably lapse into some form of adoptionism. The presence of the Spirit in Jesus is neither a necessary nor a sufficient ground for maintaining the divinity of Christ. God would be present in Jesus "only as the power of the Spirit which fills him." Jesus could, according to Pannenberg, be viewed simply as a prophetic or charismatic figure – in other words, as a human being who had been “adopted” by God and endowed with the gift of the Spirit. As we have seen, for Pannenberg it is the resurrection of Jesus, rather than the presence of the Spirit in his ministry, that is of decisive importance in this respect.

Nevertheless, Kasper is perhaps less vulnerable to Pannenberg's critique than at first might seem to be the case. Pannenberg's anxiety is that an approach such as Kasper's might lead to a Christology which places Jesus on a par with an Old Testament prophet or charismatic religious leader. However, Kasper insists that the resurrection of Jesus is of decisive importance. Both Pannenberg and Kasper regard the resurrection as having a retroactive character. Pannenberg locates this in terms of the validation and justification of the religious claims of Jesus during his ministry. Kasper, on the other hand, sees the resurrection as linked with the work of the Spirit, and justifies this with reference to pivotal New Testament texts (especially Romans 8: 11 and 1 Peter 3: 18). The Christian understanding of the role of the Spirit is grounded in the role of the Spirit at the resurrection, which excludes an adoptionist Christology.

Christ as the Example of a Godly Life

The Enlightenment raised a series of challenges to Christology, which will be explored further in the following chapter. One such challenge was to the notion of Jesus Christ differing in kind from other human beings. If Jesus Christ differed from other human beings, it was in relation to the extent to which he possessed certain qualities – qualities which were, in principle, capable of being imitated or acquired by everyone else. The particular significance of Christ resides in his being an example of a godly life – that is, a life which resonates with the divine will for humanity.

This view can be shown to be one aspect of the Antiochene Christology, which was especially concerned to bring out the moral aspects of Christ's character. For a number of Antiochene writers, Christ's divinity serves to give authority and weight to his human moral example. It is also an important aspect of the Christology of the medieval writer Peter Abelard (1079–1142), who was concerned to stress the subjective impact of Christ upon believers. However, these writers all retained the classical conception of the “two natures” of Christ. With the Enlightenment, the affirmation of the divinity of Christ became increasingly problematic. Two main approaches came to be developed.

First, the Enlightenment itself witnessed the development of a “degree Christology,” which located the significance of Jesus Christ in his human moral example. In his life, Christ was an outstanding moral educator, whose teachings were authoritative, not on account of his identity, but on account of their resonance with the moral values of the Enlightenment itself. In his death, he provided an example of self-giving love which the Enlightenment regarded as foundational to its morality. If Jesus Christ can be spoken of as “divine,” it is in the sense of embodying or exemplifying the lifestyle which ought to typify the person who stands in a correct moral relationship to God, to other human beings, and to the world in general.

Second, liberal Protestantism came to focus upon the inner life of Jesus Christ, or his “religious personality,” as being of decisive importance. In Jesus Christ, the appropriate inner or spiritual relationship of the believer to God may be discerned. It is the “inner life of Jesus” that is regarded as being of decisive importance to faith. The “religious personality of Jesus” is seen as something that is compelling, capable of being assimilated by believers, and hitherto without parallel in the religious and cultural history of humanity. An excellent representative of this approach may be found in Wilhelm Herrmann (1846–1922), who understood Jesus to have made known and made available something that was new, and that this is thence made known in the inner life of the Christian.

It is the “impression of Jesus” which the believer gains from the gospels that is of decisive importance. This gives rise to a personal certainty of faith which is grounded in an inner experience. “There arises in our hearts the certainty that God himself is turning toward us in this experience.” Perhaps the most significant statement of such views is found in Herrmann's 1892 essay “The Historical Christ as the Ground of our Faith.” In this essay, which is basically a study of the manner in which the historical figure of Jesus can function as the basis of faith, Herrmann drew a sharp distinction between the “historical fact of the person of Jesus” and the “fact of the personal life of Jesus,” understanding by the latter the psychological impact of the figure of Jesus upon the reader of the gospels.

Christ as a Hero

One of the most interesting developments in the history of Christology took place in England during the Anglo-Saxon era. How could the significance of Christ be portrayed in terms that Anglo-Saxon culture would recognize and appreciate? Heroic ideals were deeply embedded in this culture, both in Germany and subsequently in England. The great stories of heroes such as Beowulf and Ingelt were related with enthusiasm, and served to keep alive the heroic ideas of that culture. So great was the influence of these writings that in 797 the leading churchman Alcuin (c.735–804) wrote to his colleague Higbald of Lindisfarne (died 802) asking that Scripture and the works of the Christian fathers – not pagan myths! – should be read aloud at meals in the monastic refectories. So what better way to counter the influence of pagan heroes than to portray Christ himself as the hero above all heroes?

This literary transformation of Christ to conform to the heroic ideals of the age is best seen in the famous Old English poem The Dream of the Rood, thought to have been written about the year 750. (The term “rood” means “cross.”) This dramatic and highly original work offers an account and interpretation of Christ's death and resurrection which represents a significant change of emphasis from the original biblical accounts of these events. In order to emphasize the momentous triumph of the crucifixion, the author depicts Christ as a bold and confident warrior who confronts and defeats sin in a heroic battle.

This way of representing Christ made a direct appeal to the virtues of honor and courage, which were greatly revered in Anglo-Saxon culture at this time.

The Dream of the Rood is a remarkable piece of poetry and establishes a firm link between the heroic ideals of Anglo-Saxon culture and the achievement of Christ on the cross. The most distinctive feature of the poem is its deliberate and systematic portrayal of Christ as a hero, who mounts the cross in order to achieve a magnificent victory. The poet depicts Christ as enthusiastically preparing for combat and longing to engage with his enemies, rather than endorsing the more traditional imagery of Christ being led passively to the cross.

This active role on the part of Christ the hero is echoed by language used by the cross itself in the poem. The poet hears the cross tell its own story, particularly how it saw “the Lord of all mankind hasten with much fortitude, for he meant to mount upon me.” These words tend to suggest a much more active and purposeful image of Christ than the more passive language of certain biblical passages, such as those which speak of the “Passover lamb which has been sacrificed,” implying activity on the part of those who killed Christ and passivity on the part of Christ as a victim.

The poet regularly styles Christ as “the young hero” or “the warrior,” avoiding the traditional language of Christian theology. Christ is portrayed as a heroic, fair, young knight in terms which echo the description of Beowulf, a much-admired mythical hero of the same era. In Beowulf, the central figure of the narrative is acclaimed as a “king,” “hero,” and “valiant warrior,” possessed of “strength and vigor,” “daring,” and a “determined resolve.” When Beowulf prepares to go into battle against Grendel's mother, he shows no concern for his own life or safety and is eager to plunge into battle. Indeed, the author of The Dream of the Rood seems to know little of the biblical accounts of the crucifixion, suggesting that the primary source for his ideas may have been liturgical rather than a direct knowledge of the biblical material.

Kenotic Approaches to Christology

During the early seventeenth century a controversy developed between Lutheran theologians based at the German universities of Giessen and Tübingen. The question at issue can be stated as follows. The gospels contain no reference to Christ making use of all his divine attributes (such as omniscience) during his period on earth. How is this to be explained? Two options seemed to present themselves to these Lutheran writers as appropriately orthodox solutions: either Christ used his divine powers in secret or he abstained from using them altogether. The first option, which came to be known as “krypsis,” was vigorously defended by Tübingen; the second, which came to be known as “kenosis,” was defended with equal vigor by Giessen.

Yet it must be noted that both parties were in agreement that Christ possessed the central attributes of divinity – such as omnipotence and omnipresence – during the period of the incarnation. The debate was over the question of their use: were they used in secret or not at all? A much more radical approach came to be developed during the nineteenth century, which saw a growing appreciation of the humanity of Jesus, especially his religious personality. Thus Alois E. Biedermann (1819–85) stated that “the religious principle of Christianity is to be more precisely defined as the religious personality of Jesus, that is, that relationship between God and humanity which, in the religious self-consciousness of Jesus, has entered into the history of humanity as a new religious fact with the power to inspire faith.”

The roots of this idea can be argued to lie in German Pietism, especially in the form this takes in the writings of Nikolaus von Zinzendorf (1700–60), whose “religion of the heart” laid particular emphasis upon an intimate personal relationship between the believer and Christ. It was developed and redirected by F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834), who regarded himself as a Herrnhuter (that is, a follower of Zinzendorf) “of a higher order.” Schleiermacher’s understanding of the manner in which Christ is able to assimilate believers into his fellowship has strong parallels with Zinzendorf's analysis of the role of religious feelings in the spiritual life, and their grounding in the believer's fellowship with Christ.

Nevertheless, the importance attached to the human personality of Jesus left a number of theological loose ends. What about the divinity of Christ? Where did this come into things? Was not the emphasis upon Christ's humanity equivalent to a neglect of his divinity? Such questions and suspicions were voiced within more orthodox circles during the 1840s and early 1850s. However, during the later 1850s an approach to Christology was mapped out which seemed to have considerable potential in this respect. At one and the same time, it defended the divinity of Christ yet justified an emphasis upon his humanity. The approach in question is known as "kenoticism" and is especially associated with the German Lutheran writer Gottfried Thomasius (1802–75).

In his Person and Work of Christ (1852–61), Thomasius argues that the incarnation involves kenosis, the deliberate setting aside of all divine attributes, so that, in the state of humiliation, Christ has voluntarily abandoned all privileges of divinity. It is therefore entirely proper to stress his humanity, especially the importance of his suffering as a human being. Thomasius's approach to Christology was much more radical than that of the early kenoticists. The incarnation involves Christ's abandoning of the attributes of divinity. They are set to one side during the entire period from the birth of Christ to his resurrection. Basing his ideas on Philippians 2: 6–8, Thomasius argued that, in the incarnation, the second person of the Trinity reduced himself totally to the level of humanity. A theological and spiritual emphasis upon the humanity of Christ was thus entirely justified.

This approach to Christology was criticized by Isaak August Dorner (1809–84), on the grounds that it introduced change into God himself. The doctrine of the immutability of God was thus, he argued, compromised by Thomasius's approach. Interestingly, this insight contains much truth, and can be seen as an anticipation of the twentieth-century debate over the question of the “suffering of God,” noted earlier (p. 184).

The approach was also taken up with some enthusiasm in England. In 1891, Charles Gore argued that Christ had emptied himself of the divine attributes, especially omniscience, in the incarnation. This prompted leading traditionalist Darwell Stone (1859–1941) to charge that Gore's view “contradicted the practically unanimous teaching of the fathers, and is inconsistent with the immutability of the divine nature.” Once more, such comments point to the close connection between Christology and theology, and indicate the importance of Christological considerations for the development of the doctrine of “a suffering God.”

The Quest for the Historical Jesus

Earlier, we considered some debates about Christology from the patristic and medieval periods. Interestingly, Christology was not a major topic of controversy during the great debates of the Reformation era. Catholics and mainstream Protestants saw no reason to disagree with the Chalcedonian definition of the identity and significance of Jesus Christ, which both regarded as firmly rooted in the Bible and Christian tradition. The next major debate about Christology arose in the “Age of Reason.” The rationalist assumptions of this era gave rise to suspicion of any idea of a specific human being having privileged insights or status. Rationalist writers argued that Jesus of Nazareth had been misunderstood by the early church. It was necessary to go behind both Christian tradition and the New Testament, and uncover a simpler, more plausible view of Jesus Christ, consistent with the values of the “Age of Reason.” As a result, the movement that we now know as the “Quest for the Historical Jesus” got under way in the late eighteenth century.

In this section, we shall consider the history and theological significance of this “Quest for the Historical Jesus.” Although this topic is of particular importance for New Testament scholarship, it clearly has relevance for theological debates about the identity and significance of Jesus Christ. We begin by considering the origins of the quest.

The Original Quest for the Historical Jesus

The original quest for the historical Jesus was based upon the presupposition that there was a radical gulf between the historical figure of Jesus and the interpretation which the Christian church had placed upon him. The “historical Jesus” who lies behind the New Testament was a simple religious teacher; the “Christ of faith” was a misrepresentation of this simple figure by early church writers. By going back to the historical Jesus, a more credible version of Christianity would result, stripped of all unnecessary and inappropriate dogmatic additions (such as the idea of the resurrection or the divinity of Christ).

Such ideas, although frequently expressed by English Deists during the seventeenth century, received their classic statements in Germany in the late eighteenth century, especially through the posthumously published writings of Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768). Reimarus became increasingly convinced that both Judaism and Christianity rested upon fraudulent foundations, and conceived the idea of writing a major work which would bring this fact to public attention. Reimarus's Apology for the Rational Worshipper of God subjected the entire biblical canon to rationalist criticism. However, reluctant to cause any controversy, Reimarus did not publish the work. It remained in manuscript form until his death.

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81) came across the work and decided to publish a selection of extracts. These “fragments of an unknown writer,” published in 1774, caused a sensation. The volume contained five fragments, now generally known as the “Wolfenbüttel Fragments,” and included a sustained attack on the historicity of the resurrection.

The final fragment, entitled “On the Aims of Jesus and His Disciples,” concerned the nature of our knowledge of Jesus Christ, and raised the question of whether the gospel accounts of Jesus had been tampered with by the early Christians. Reimarus argued that there was a radical difference between the beliefs and intentions of Jesus himself and those of the apostolic church. Jesus's language and images of God were, according to Reimarus, those of a Jewish apocalyptic visionary, with a radically limited chronological and political reference and relevance. Jesus accepted the late Jewish expectation of a messiah who would deliver his people from Roman occupation, and believed that God would assist him in this task. His cry of dereliction on the cross represented his final realization that he had been deluded and mistaken.

However, Reimarus argued, the disciples were not prepared to leave things like this. They invented the idea of a “spiritual redemption” in the place of Jesus's concrete political vision of an Israel liberated from foreign occupation. They invented the idea of the resurrection of Jesus, in order to cover up the embarrassment caused by his death. As a result, the disciples invented doctrines quite unknown to Jesus, such as his death being an atonement for human sin, adding such ideas to the biblical text to make it harmonize with their beliefs. As a result, the New Testament as we now have it is riddled with fraudulent interpolations. The real Jesus of history is concealed from us by the apostolic church, which has substituted a fictitious Christ of faith, the redeemer of humanity from sin.

Although Reimarus found few, if any, followers at the time, he raised questions which would become of fundamental importance in subsequent years. In particular, his explicit distinction between the legitimate historical Jesus and the fictitious Christ of faith proved to be of enormous significance. The resulting “quest for the historical Jesus” arose as a direct result of the growing rationalist suspicion that the New Testament portrayal of Christ was a dogmatic invention. It was possible to reconstruct the real historical figure of Jesus, and disentangle him from the dogmatic ideas in which the apostles had clothed him.

The Quest for the Religious Personality of Jesus

A more subtle version of this approach is linked with the rise of liberal Protestantism in the nineteenth century, particularly the writings of Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl (see pp. 70–1). The emergence of movements such as Romanticism led to rationalism increasingly being regarded as outmoded (see pp. 139–40). A new interest developed in “the human spirit” and in the more specifically religious aspects of human life. This led to a new interest in the religious personality of Jesus. Ideas such as the “divinity” of Christ were regarded as outmoded; the idea of a “religious personality” of Jesus, which could be imitated by anyone, seemed a much more acceptable way of restating Christological issues in the modern period.

As a result, renewed attention was paid to the nature of the New Testament sources upon which the life of the historical Jesus could be constructed. It was widely believed that the new literary approach to the New Testament in general, and the synoptic gospels in particular, would permit scholars to establish a firmly drawn and lifelike portrait which would clearly bring out the personality of Jesus.

The assumption underlying this “life of Jesus” movement in the later nineteenth century was that the remarkable religious personality of Jesus, whose shape could be determined by conscientious historical inquiry, would provide a solid historical foundation for faith. The firm ground of historical truth upon which Christian faith depended was thus not supernatural or antirational (a perceived weakness of traditional Christology) but merely the religious personality of Jesus, a fact of history open to scientific investigation. The impression that he made upon his contemporaries could be reproduced in his followers of every age.

The Critique of the Quest, 1890–1910

Three main criticisms of the “religious personality” Christology of liberal Protestantism emerged in the two decades before the First World War; we shall consider them individually.

The Apocalyptic Critique

This criticism, primarily associated with Johannes Weiss (1863–1914) and Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965), maintained that the strongly eschatological bias of Jesus's proclamation of the kingdom of God called the essentially Kantian liberal interpretation of the concept into question. In 1892, Weiss published Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God. In this book, he argued that the idea of the “kingdom of God” was understood by the liberal Protestants to mean the exercise of the moral life in society, or a supreme ethical ideal. In other words, it was conceived primarily as something subjective, inward, or spiritual, rather than in spatiotemporal terms. For Weiss, Albrecht Ritschl's concept of the kingdom of God was essentially continuous with that of the Enlightenment. It was a static moral concept without eschatological overtones. The rediscovery of the eschatology of the preaching of Jesus called into question not merely this understanding of the kingdom of God but also the liberal portrait of Christ in general. The kingdom of God was thus not to be seen as a settled and static realm of liberal moral values but as a devastating apocalyptic moment which overturned human values (see pp. 432–3).

Where Weiss regarded a substantial part (but not all) of the teaching of Jesus as being conditioned by his radical eschatological expectations, Schweitzer argued that every aspect of the teaching and attitudes of Jesus was determined by his eschatological outlook. The entire content of Jesus's message was consistently and thoroughly conditioned by apocalyptic ideas – ideas which were quite alien to the settled outlook of late nineteenth-century western Europe.

The result of this consistent eschatological interpretation of the person and message of Jesus of Nazareth was a portrait of Christ as a remote and strange figure, an apocalyptic and wholly unworldly person. Jesus thus appears to us as a strange figure from an alien first-century Jewish apocalyptic milieu, so that, in Schweitzer's famous words, “he comes to us as one unknown.”

The Skeptical Critique

This approach, associated particularly with William Wrede, called into question the historical status of our knowledge of Jesus in the first place. History and theology were closely intermingled in the synoptic narratives, and could not be disentangled. According to Wrede, Mark was painting a theological picture in the guise of history, imposing his theology upon the material which he had at his disposal. The second gospel was not objectively historical but was actually a creative theological reinterpretation of history.

It was thus impossible to go behind Mark's narrative and reconstruct the history of Jesus, for the reason that – if Wrede is right – this narrative is itself a theological construction, beyond which one cannot go. The “quest for the historical Jesus” thus comes to an end since it proves impossible to establish an historical foundation for the “real” Jesus of history.

The Dogmatic Critique

This line of criticism, expressed by the dogmatic theologian Martin Kähler (1835–1912), challenged the theological significance of the reconstruction of the historical Jesus. The “historical Jesus” was an irrelevance to faith, which was based upon the “Christ of faith.” Kähler rightly saw that the dispassionate and provisional Jesus of the academic historian cannot become the object of faith. Yet how can Jesus Christ be the authentic basis and content of Christian faith, when historical science can never establish certain knowledge concerning the historical Jesus? How can faith be based upon an historical event without being vulnerable to the charge of historical relativism? Kähler addressed these questions in his The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ (1892).

For Kähler, Christ must be regarded as a “suprahistorical” rather than an “historical” figure, so that the critical–historical method cannot be applied in his case. The critical–historical method could not deal with the suprahistorical (and hence suprahuman) characteristics of Jesus, and hence was obliged to ignore or deny them. In effect, the critical– historical method could only lead to an Arian or Ebionite Christology, on account of its latent dogmatic presuppositions.

Many historians of Christian thought argue that the demolition of the original “quest” was so effective that an extended period of “no quest” set in, lasting until the end of the Second World War. Historically, it was generally believed that it was impossible to disentangle the Jesus of the gospels from the historical Jesus. Theologically, many felt the quest was theologically illegitimate because Christianity is based upon faith in Christ rather than the historical person of Jesus. This inevitably reduces the perceived importance of the historical Jesus.

Considerations such as these gradually came to dominate the theological scene and may be regarded as reaching their climax in the writings of Rudolf Bultmann, to which we now turn.

The Quest Suspended: Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976)

Bultmann regarded the entire enterprise of the historical reconstruction of Jesus as something of a dead end. History was not of fundamental importance to Christology; it was merely necessary that Jesus existed, and that the Christian proclamation (which Bultmann terms the kerygma; Greek: “proclamation” or “message”) is somehow grounded in his person. Bultmann thus famously reduced the entire historical aspect of Christology to a single word – “that.” It is necessary only to believe that Jesus Christ lies behind the gospel proclamation (or kerygma). With such slogans, the grand generation-long retreat of Christology from historical engagement began.

For Bultmann, it was not possible to go behind the kerygma, using it as a “source” in order to reconstruct an “historical Jesus” with his “messianic consciousness,” his “inner life,” or his “heroism.” That would merely be “Christ according to the flesh,” who no longer exists. It is not the historical Jesus but Jesus Christ the one who is preached who is the Lord.

This radical move away from history alarmed many. How could anyone rest assured that Christology was properly grounded in the person and work of Jesus Christ? How could anyone begin to check out Christology, if the history of Jesus was an irrelevance? It seemed to an increasing number of writers, within the fields of both New Testament and dogmatic studies, that Bultmann had merely cut a Gordian knot without resolving these serious historical issues at stake. For Bultmann, all that could be, and could be required to be, known about the historical Jesus was the fact that (das Dass) he existed.

The New Quest for the Historical Jesus

A “new quest for the historical Jesus” is generally regarded as having been inaugurated with a lecture in October 1953 by Ernst Käsemann (1906–98) on the problem of the historical Jesus. Despite their obviously theological concerns, Käsemann argued that the evangelists had access to historical information concerning Jesus of Nazareth, and that this historical information was expressed and embodied in the text of the synoptic gospels. The gospels include both the kerygma and historical narrative.

Käsemann thus points to the need to explore the continuity between the preaching of Jesus and the preaching about Jesus. There is an obvious discontinuity between the earthly Jesus and the exalted and proclaimed Christ; yet a thread of continuity links them, in that the proclaimed Christ is already present, in some sense, in the historical Jesus. It must be stressed that Käsemann is not suggesting that a new inquiry should be undertaken concerning the historical Jesus in order to provide historical legitimation for the kerygma; still less is he suggesting that the discontinuity between the historical Jesus and the proclaimed Christ necessitates the deconstruction of the latter in terms of the former. Rather, Käsemann is pointing to the theological assertion of the identity of the earthly Jesus and the exalted Christ being historically grounded in the actions and preaching of Jesus of Nazareth.

This theological affirmation is, Käsemann argues, dependent upon the historical demonstration that the kerygma concerning Jesus is already contained in a nutshell or embryonic form in the ministry of Jesus. In that the kerygma contains historical elements, it is entirely proper and necessary to inquire concerning the relationship between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith.

It will be clear that this “new quest for the historical Jesus” is qualitatively different from the discredited quest of the nineteenth century. Käsemann’s argument rests upon the recognition that the discontinuity between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith does not imply that they are unrelated entities, with the latter having no grounding or foundation in the former. Rather, the kerygma may be discerned in the actions and preaching of Jesus of Nazareth, so that there is a continuity between the preaching of Jesus and the preaching about Jesus. Where the older quest had assumed that the discontinuity between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith implied that the latter was potentially a fiction, who required to be reconstructed in the light of objective historical investigation, Käsemann stressed that such reconstruction is neither necessary nor possible.

The “new quest for the historical Jesus” was thus concerned to stress the continuity between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith. Whereas the “old quest” had the aim of discrediting the New Testament portrayal of Christ, the “new quest” ended up consolidating it by stressing the continuities between the preaching of Jesus himself and the church’s preaching about Jesus.

The growing realization of the importance of this point led to intensive interest developing in the question of the historical foundations of the kerygma. Four positions of interest may be noted.

1. Joachim Jeremias (1900–79), perhaps representing an extreme element in this debate, seemed to suggest that the basis of the Christian faith lies in what Jesus actually said and did, insofar as this can be established by theological scholarship. The first part of his New Testament Theology (1971) was thus devoted in its totality to the “proclamation of Jesus” as a central element of New Testament theology.

2. Käsemann himself identified the continuity between the historical Jesus and the kerygmatic Christ in their common declaration of the dawning of the eschatological kingdom of God. Both in the preaching of Jesus and in the early Christian kerygma, the theme of the coming of the kingdom is of major importance.
3. The Swiss theologian Gerhard Ebeling (1912–2001) located the continuity in the notion of the “faith of Jesus,” which he understood to be analogous to the “faith of Abraham” (described in Romans 4) – a prototypical faith, historically exemplified and embodied in Jesus of Nazareth, and proclaimed to be a contemporary possibility for believers.
4. Günter Bornkamm (1905–90) laid particular emphasis upon the note of authority evident in the ministry of Jesus. In Jesus, the actuality of God confronts humanity, and calls it to a radical decision. Whereas Bultmann located the essence of Jesus's preaching in the future coming of the kingdom of God, Bornkamm shifted the emphasis from the future to the present confrontation of individuals with God through the person of Jesus. This theme of “confrontation with God” is evident in both the ministry of Jesus and the proclamation about Jesus, providing a major theological and historical link between the earthly Jesus and the proclaimed Christ.

Since then, there have been other developments in the field. In the 1970s and 1980s, particular attention was directed toward exploring the relationship between Jesus and his environment in first-century Judaism. This development, which is especially associated with Geza Vermes (1924–2013) and E. P. Sanders (born 1937), renewed interest in the Jewish background to Jesus and further emphasized the importance of history in relation to Christology. The Bultmann approach – which devalues the significance of history in Christology – is widely regarded as discredited, at least for the moment. This can be seen in the new interest in the “historical Jesus” associated with what has come to be known as the “third quest.”

The Third Quest for the Historical Jesus

Since the general collapse of the “new quest” during the 1960s, a series of works have appeared offering re-evaluations of the historical Jesus. The term “third quest” has often been applied to this group of works. The designation has been called into question by a number of writers who point out that the works and scholars who are gathered together under this term do not have enough in common to categorize them in this way. Despite this reservation, the term seems to be gaining acceptance, and it is therefore appropriate to include it in this survey. Whatever the differences between its proponents, the “third quest” has a number of common elements, particularly an emphasis on the Jewishness of Jesus and the necessity of understanding him in the context of first-century Judaism, set against the backdrop of the social world of first-century Palestine.

The “original quest” approached the stories of Jesus in the light of a series of strongly rationalist presuppositions, inherited from the Enlightenment, and filtered out the miraculous aspects of the gospel narratives. The “new quest” tended to focus on the words of Jesus, stressing the continuity between the preaching of Jesus himself and the New Testament preaching about Jesus. The “third quest” seems to involve a focus on the relation of Jesus to his Jewish context as indicative of the distinctive character of his mission, and his understanding of his own goals. Among significant contributions to the “third quest,” the following should be noted in particular:

1. John Dominic Crossan (born 1934) has argued that Jesus was essentially a poor Jewish peasant with a particular concern to challenge the power structures of contemporary society. In The Historical Jesus (1991) and Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (1994), Crossan argues that Jesus broke down prevailing social conventions, especially through his table fellowship with sinners and social outcasts.

2. In books such as Jesus: A New Vision (1988) and Meeting Jesus again for the First Time (1994), Marcus L. Borg (1942–2015) suggests that Jesus was a subversive sage concerned with renewing Judaism in a manner which posed a powerful challenge to the ruling temple elite.
3. E. P. Sanders insists that Jesus is to be seen as a prophetic figure who was concerned with the restoration of the Jewish people. In works such as Jesus and Judaism (1985) and The Historical Figure of Jesus (1993), Sanders suggests that Jesus envisaged an eschatological restoration of Israel. God would bring the present age to an end and usher in a new order focusing on a new temple, with Jesus himself acting as God's representative.
4. The British New Testament scholar N. T. Wright (born 1948), in his series Christian Origins and the Question of God, offers a critical appropriation of the approach of E. P. Sanders, while retaining the idea that the coming of Jesus Christ introduced something radically new, especially in relation to the identity of the people of God. The first two volumes in this series – The New Testament and the People of God (1992) and Jesus and the Victory of God (1996) – are widely regarded as among the most significant recent writings in the field of New Testament studies.

On the basis of this brief analysis of a few writers generally regarded as representative of the “third quest,” it will be clear that this iteration of the quest lacks a coherent theological or historical core. There is significant disagreement concerning whether Jesus is to be seen against a Jewish or Hellenistic background; about his attitude to the Jewish Law and its religious institutions; about his view of the future of Israel; and about the personal significance of Jesus in relation to that future. Nevertheless, the term “third quest” has found at least a degree of acceptance, despite its clear weaknesses, and it is likely to remain an integral part of scholarly discussion of this important issue.

The Resurrection of Christ: History and Interpretation

One issue that emerged as particularly important throughout the various “quests for the historical Jesus” was the historicity of the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. In what follows, we shall outline some of the main positions to have developed during the modern period, and briefly note their significance.

The Enlightenment: Resurrection as Nonevent

The characteristic Enlightenment emphasis on the importance of contemporary analogs to past events led to the development of an intensely skeptical attitude toward the resurrection in the eighteenth century. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing provides an excellent example of this attitude. He confesses that he does not have personal first-hand experience of the resurrection of Jesus Christ; so why, he asks, should he be asked to believe in something which he has not personally witnessed?

For Lessing, being obligated to accept the testimony of others is tantamount to a compromising of human intellectual autonomy. There are no contemporary analogs for the resurrection. Resurrection is not an aspect of modern-day experience. So why trust the New Testament reports? For Lessing, the resurrection is little more than a misunderstood nonevent.

David Friedrich Strauss (1808–74): Resurrection as Myth

In his Life of Jesus (1835), David Friedrich Strauss provided a radical new approach to the question of the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. Strauss declared his intention to explain “the origin of faith in the resurrection of Jesus without any corresponding miraculous fact.” Having excluded the resurrection as a “miraculous objective occurrence,” Strauss located the origin of the belief at the purely subjective level. Belief in the resurrection is not to be explained as a response to “a life objectively restored” but is “a subjective conception in the mind”: faith in the resurrection of Jesus is the outcome of an exaggerated “recollection of the personality of Jesus himself” by which a memory has been projected into the idea of a living presence. A dead Jesus is thus transfigured into an imaginary risen Christ – a mythical risen Christ, to use the appropriate term.

Strauss's distinctive contribution to the debate was to introduce the category of “myth” – a reflection of the gospel writers' social conditioning and cultural outlook. To suggest that their writings were partly “mythical” was thus not so much a challenge to their integrity but simply an acknowledgment of the premodern outlook of the period in which they were written. Perhaps Strauss's most astute reinterpreter in the twentieth century has been Rudolf Bultmann, to whose distinctive views on the resurrection we now turn.

Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976): Resurrection as an Event in the Experience of the Disciples

Bultmann shared Strauss's basic conviction that, in this scientific age, it is impossible to believe in miracles. As a result, belief in an objective resurrection of Jesus is no longer possible; however, it may well prove to be possible to make sense of it in another manner. History, Bultmann argued, is “a closed continuum of effects in which individual events are connected by the succession of cause and effect.” The resurrection, in common with other miracles, would thus disrupt the closed system of nature.

Belief in an objective resurrection of Jesus, although perfectly legitimate and intelligible in the first century, cannot be taken seriously today. The resurrection is to be regarded as “a mythical event, pure and simple.” The resurrection is something which happened in the subjective experience of the disciples, not something which took place in the public arena of history. For Bultmann, Jesus has indeed been raised – he has been raised up into the kerygma. The preaching of Jesus himself has been transformed into the Christian proclamation of Christ. Jesus has become an element of Christian preaching; he has been raised up and taken up into the proclamation of the gospel. “The resurrection itself is not an event of past history. All that historical criticism can establish is that the first disciples came to believe in the resurrection.”

Bultmann thus directs attention away from the historical Jesus toward the proclamation of Christ. “Faith in the church as the bearer of the kerygma is the Easter faith which consists in the belief that Jesus Christ is present in the kerygma.”

Karl Barth (1886–1968): Resurrection as an Historical Event Beyond Critical Inquiry

In his early writings, Barth argued that the empty tomb was of minimal importance in relation to the resurrection. However, he became increasingly alarmed at Bultmann's existential approach to the resurrection, which seemed to imply that it had no objective historical foundation. For this reason, Barth came to place considerable emphasis upon the gospel accounts of the empty tomb. The empty tomb is “an indispensable sign” which “obviates all possible misunderstanding.” It demonstrates that the resurrection of Christ was not a purely inward, interior, or subjective event but something which left a mark upon history.

This would seem to suggest that Barth regarded the resurrection as being open to historical investigation, to clarify its nature and confirm its place in the public history of the world, rather than in the private interior experience of the first believers. Yet this is not so. He consistently refuses to allow the gospel narratives to be subjected to critical–historical scrutiny. It is not entirely clear why. The following factor appears to have weighed heavily in his thinking at this point.

Barth emphasizes that Paul and the other apostles are not calling for the “acceptance of a well-attested historical report” but for “a decision of faith.” Historical investigation cannot legitimate or provide security for such faith; nor can faith become dependent upon the provisional results of historical inquiry. In any case, faith is a response to the risen Christ, not to the empty tomb. Barth was quite clear that the empty tomb, taken by itself, was of little value in laying the foundation for faith in the risen Christ. The absence of Christ from his tomb does not necessarily imply his resurrection: "He might in fact have been stolen, he might have only appeared to be dead."

As a result, Barth is left in what initially seems to be a highly vulnerable position. Concerned to defend the resurrection as an act in public history against Bultmann's subjectivist approach, he is not prepared to allow that history to be critically studied. In part, this rests upon his passionate belief that historical scholarship cannot lay the basis for faith; in part, it reflects his assumption that the resurrection of Christ is part of a much larger network of ideas and events which cannot be disclosed or verified by historical inquiry. However much one may sympathize with Barth's theological concerns at this point, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that he lacks credibility. It is perhaps for this reason that the more recent approach of Wolfhart Pannenberg has been the subject of considerable attention.

Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–2014): Resurrection as an Historical Event Open to Critical Inquiry

One of the most distinctive features of the theological program of Wolfhart Pannenberg is his insistence that the resurrection of Jesus is an objective historical event, witnessed by all who had access to the evidence. Whereas Bultmann treated the resurrection as an event within the experiential world of the disciples, Pannenberg declared that it belonged to the world of universal public history.

This immediately raised the question of the historicity of the resurrection. As we noted earlier, many Enlightenment writers had argued that our only knowledge of the alleged resurrection of Jesus was contained in the New Testament. Since there were no contemporary analogs for such a resurrection, the credibility of those reports had to be seriously questioned. In a similar vein, Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923) had argued for the homogeneity of history: in that the resurrection of Jesus appeared to radically disrupt that homogeneity, it was to be regarded as of dubious historicity.

Pannenberg initially responded to these difficulties in his essay on "Redemptive Event and History," and subsequently in Jesus: God and Man. His basic argument against this position can be set out as follows.

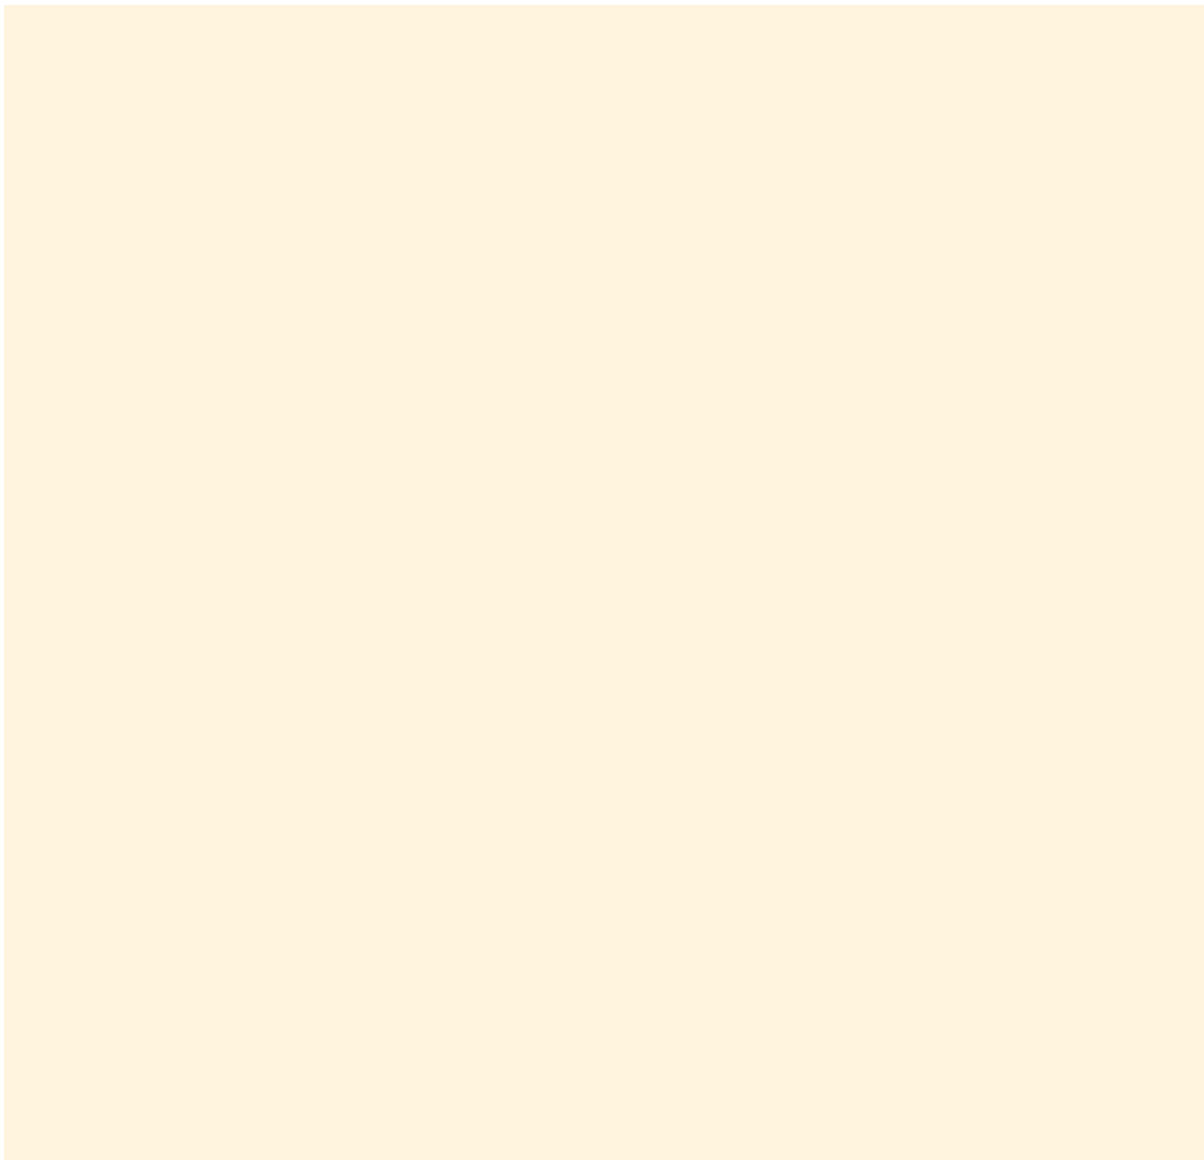

Troeltsch, in Pannenberg's view, has a pedantically narrow view of history which rules out certain events in advance, on the basis of a set of provisional judgments which have improperly come to have the status of absolute laws. Troeltsch's unwarranted "constriction of historico-critical inquiry" was "biased" and "anthropocentric." It presupposed that the human viewpoint is the only acceptable and normative standpoint within history. Analogies, Pannenberg stresses, are always analogies viewed from the standpoint of the human observer; that standpoint is radically restricted in its scope, and cannot be allowed to function as the absolutely certain basis of critical inquiry. Pannenberg is too good an historian to suggest that the principle of analogy should be abandoned; it is, after all, a proven and useful tool of historical research. Yet, Pannenberg insists, that is all that it is: it is a working tool and cannot be allowed to define a fixed view of reality.

If the historian sets out to investigate the New Testament already precommitted to the belief "dead people do not rise again," that conclusion will merely be read back into the New Testament material. The judgment "Jesus did not rise from the dead" will be the presupposition, not the conclusion, of such an investigation. Pannenberg's discussion of this question represents an impassioned and impressive plea for a neutral approach to the resurrection. The historical evidence pointing to the resurrection of Jesus must be investigated without the prior dogmatic presupposition that such a resurrection could not have happened.

Having argued for the historicity of the resurrection, Pannenberg interprets this event within the context of the apocalyptic framework of meaning. The end of history has proleptically taken place in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. This maxim dominates Pannenberg's interpretation of the event. The resurrection of Jesus anticipates the general resurrection at the end of time and thus establishes an identity between Jesus and God, which can then be read back into his pre-Easter ministry.

In the present chapter, we have surveyed some classical themes of Christology. The issues involved will probably continue to be subjects for perennial debate within Christian theology, and it is essential that the student becomes familiar with at least some of the questions discussed here. However, these issues were largely overshadowed during the period of the Enlightenment, as questions of a more historical nature came to the fore – questions which will be considered in the following chapter.

Questions for Chapter 10

1. Can Christian theology do without Jesus Christ?
2. Explore the background and significance of one of the major New Testament titles for Jesus. What are the implications of speaking of Jesus in this way?
3. Summarize the main points of difference between the Alexandrian and Antiochene approaches to Christology.
4. What theological insights are linked with the belief that Jesus Christ is “God incarnate”?
5. What is meant by speaking of Jesus Christ as “the mediator” between God and humanity?
6. Why did the “quest for the historical Jesus” get under way? What new questions did this raise? Do you think they were answered?

THE NATURE AND BASIS OF SALVATION

Christianity holds that the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ have changed things. The created order, and above all humanity, has fallen into disorder. Things are not what they are meant to be. And something has to be done about this. The same God who made the created order therefore acts to renew and reorder it. The Christian doctrine of sin tries to give an account of what went wrong; the doctrine of salvation deals with the restoration of the created order, and above all humanity, to its proper relationship to God. Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202) set out a theologically rich summary of these ideas in his classic treatise “Against the Heresies,” written in the second half of the second century:

The Lord therefore ransomed us by his own blood, and gave his life for our life, his flesh for our flesh; and he poured out the Spirit of the Father to bring about the union and fellowship of God and humanity, bringing God down to humanity through the Spirit while raising humanity to God through his incarnation, and in his coming surely and truly giving us incorruption through the fellowship which we have with him.

The concept of “atonement” is widely used to refer to the transformation of the human situation through Christ. The term is found in the theological literature both as a noun (“Christ made atonement for human sin”) and as a verb (“Christ atoned for human sin”). The Scottish theologian John McLeod Campbell (1800–72) used the term in a way that would find wide consensus within the Christian theological tradition: “Atonement is to be regarded as that by which God has bridged over the gulf which separated between what sin had made us, and what it was the desire of the divine love that we should become.” This raises the question, not simply of the nature of sin and salvation, but the manner in which the gulf between them is overcome. We shall be exploring two major questions in the present chapter: what is the basis of salvation? And how is salvation to be understood? We shall consider the related notion of sin in Chapter 14.

The English word “atonement” can be traced back to 1526, when the English writer William Tyndale (c.1494–1536) was translating the New Testament into English. There was, at that time, no generally accepted native English word which meant “reconciliation.” Tyndale thus had to invent such a word – “the atonement.” This word “atonement” mean “at-one-ment” – that is, being “at one” with someone, or being “reconciled.” This word soon came to bear the additional meaning “the benefits which Jesus Christ brings to believers through his death upon the cross.” This unfamiliar word is rarely used in modern English and has a distinctively old-fashioned feel to it. Rather than convey the impression that Christian thought is totally out of date, theologians now generally prefer to speak of this area as “the doctrine of the work of Christ.”

The Christian doctrine of salvation focuses on Jesus Christ, as the redeemer and savior of the world. For Christianity, Christ changed things so dramatically, so comprehensively, that both the acts that changed things and the difference that they make needed to be explained. Earlier, we noted that one of the distinctive themes of Christian understandings of the significance of Jesus of Nazareth is that he is the ground of salvation (p. 209). In this chapter, we are going to explore Christian understandings of salvation, looking at both the way in which Jesus of Nazareth is understood to be the foundation of this salvation and what shape that salvation itself takes.

The doctrine of salvation is one of the most fascinating and challenging areas of theology, and displays the great variety of intellectual approaches within the Christian tradition. On the one hand, we find writers who, fired with a wonderful exuberance of the imagination, envisage Christ's death and resurrection as transforming humanity and the entire cosmos, reshaping them and allowing them to share in the divine life. On the other, we find writers who sense the need for caution and want to remain firmly within the realms of the reasonable. Here, Christ is often depicted as offering humanity a superb religious and moral example which will guide and inspire them as they seek to find and lead the good life.

Chapter 10 considered a series of issues concerning the identity of Jesus Christ. As we noticed during that discussion, a central question concerning the identity of Jesus Christ relates to his function. What did Jesus do? Or, even more significantly: what does Jesus do? As we saw in the previous chapter (pp. 225–7), there is an organic relationship between the two central questions:

- Who is Jesus Christ?
- What did Jesus Christ achieve?

The identity and function of Jesus Christ can be thought of as two sides of the same coin. The close connection between functional and ontological Christologies (pp. 213, 226) should be noted in this respect.

Christian Approaches to Salvation

“Salvation” is a complex notion. First, we need to note that the term “salvation” does not necessarily have a specifically Christian reference. The term can be used in a thoroughly secular manner. For example, it was common for Soviet writers, especially during the late 1920s, to speak of Lenin as the “savior” of the Soviet peoples. Military coups in African states during the 1980s frequently resulted in the setting up of “councils of salvation,” concerned to restore political and economic stability. Salvation can be a purely secular notion, concerned with political emancipation or the general human quest for liberation. Similarly, other religious traditions also speak of offering “salvation,” even if they define these notions in ways which differ significantly from their Christian equivalents.

The distinctiveness of the Christian approach to salvation lies in two different areas. In the first place, salvation is understood to be grounded in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ; in the second, the specific shape of salvation within the Christian tradition is itself established by Christ, and reflected in him. These ideas are complex and require further exploration before we can proceed.

Salvation is Linked with Jesus Christ

First, Christianity holds that salvation – however that is subsequently defined – is linked with the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This interconnection of Jesus Christ with the achievement of salvation has been characteristic of Christian theology down the ages. While a wide range of metaphors are used in the New Testament and the Christian tradition to describe the transformation of the human situation through redemption, all of them converge on the person of Jesus Christ as their ultimate ground and goal. The Confession (1967) of the Presbyterian Church (USA) set this out in contemporary language:

God's reconciling act in Jesus Christ is a mystery which the Scriptures describe in various ways. It is called the sacrifice of a lamb, a shepherd's life given for his sheep, atonement by a priest; again it is ransom of a slave, payment of a debt, vicarious satisfaction of a legal penalty, and victory over the powers of evil. These are expressions of a truth which remains beyond the reach of all theory in the depths of God's love for people. They reveal the gravity, cost, and sure achievement of God's reconciling work.

A significant debate in more recent theological literature has concerned whether the cross can be said to be constitutive or illustrative of salvation. In his Doctrine of Reconciliation (1898), the noted German theologian Martin Kähler (1835–1912) posed the following question concerning theories of the atonement: “Did Christ just make known some insights concerning an unchangeable situation – or did he establish a new situation?” With this question we come to a central aspect of soteriology: does the cross of Christ illustrate the saving will of God, giving shape to a hitherto vague notion? Or does it make such a salvation possible in the first place? Is it illustrative or constitutive?

The second such approach has been characteristic of much traditional Christian theology. Christ is seen as having achieved something which makes possible a new situation. Redemption is the direct result of Christ's life, death, and resurrection. To put it more forcefully: salvation is grounded in the life, death, and resurrection of Christ. There has, of course, been much debate on precisely how Christ made such a new situation possible. For example, Irenaeus developed the idea of “recapitulation” – the “going over again” of all the events in history at which humanity lost its way. Christ thus “recapitulates” the history of Adam, succeeding where Adam failed and thereby undoing the fall of humanity.

When [Christ] was incarnate and became a human being, he recapitulated in himself the long history of the human race, obtaining salvation for us, so that we might regain in Jesus Christ what we had lost in Adam, that is, being in the image and likeness of God.

The former approach has, however, been characteristic of much writing inspired by the Enlightenment, which treats the cross as an historical symbol of a timeless truth. Christ does not establish a new situation but discloses what is in reality true, even if humanity has not been fully aware of it. John Macquarrie (1919–2007) firmly defends this approach in his Principles of Christian Theology (1966):

It is not that, at a given moment, God adds the activity of reconciliation to his previous activities, or that we can set a time when his reconciling activity began. Rather, it is the case that at a given time there was a new and decisive interpretation of an activity that had always been going on, an activity that is equiprimordial with creation itself.

A similar approach is associated with Oxford theologian Maurice F. Wiles (1923–2005), who argues in his Remaking of Christian Doctrine (1974) that the Christ-event is “in some way a demonstration of what is true of God's eternal nature.” Christ is here understood to reveal the saving will of God, not to establish that saving will in the first place. The coming of Christ is an expression and public demonstration of God's saving will.

Others have vigorously opposed this approach. In his Actuality of Atonement (1988) the English theologian Colin Gunton (1941–2003) suggests that these kinds of approaches to the atonement risk falling back into exemplarist and subjective doctrines of salvation. It is, he argues, necessary to say that Christ does not just reveal something of importance to us; he achieves something for us – something without which salvation would not be possible. Raising the question of whether “the real evil of the world is faced and healed ontologically in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus,” Gunton argues that there must be a sense in which Christ is a “substitute” for us: he does for us something that we ourselves cannot do. To deny this is to revert to some form of purely subjective understanding of salvation.

Gunton's approach may be regarded as characteristic of much of the pre-Enlightenment Christian discussion of the foundations of salvation, which reflects the fundamental conviction that something new happened in Christ which makes possible and available a new way of life. This approach continues to be definitive within modern evangelicalism, and has exercised a deep and continuing influence over the hymns and liturgies of the Christian church.

Salvation is Shaped by Jesus Christ

Alongside the characteristic Christian insistence that salvation is linked with Jesus Christ may be found a further Christological assertion: salvation is shaped by Christ. In other words, Jesus Christ provides a model or paradigm for the redeemed life. While the Christian tradition has been thoroughly unsympathetic to the idea that the imitation of Christ in itself is or gives rise to the Christian life, there is widespread agreement that Christ in some sense gives shape or specification to that life.

The idea that the mere external imitation of Christ gives rise to the Christian life has generally been regarded as Pelagian (see pp. 333–4). The mainstream Christian approach has tended to argue that the Christian life is made possible through Christ, while recognizing two quite distinct manners in which the resulting Christian life is “shaped” by him. We shall set these two positions out as follows:

1. The Christian life takes the form of the believer's sustained attempt to imitate Christ. Having become a Christian, the believer now treats Christ as an example of the ideal relationship to God and other people, and attempts to mimic this relationship. This approach may perhaps be seen at its best in the works of some later medieval spiritual writers, especially those working within a monastic situation, such as the famous Imitation of Christ (c.1418), by Thomas à Kempis (c.1379–1471). This influential book emphasized the human responsibility to bring one's life into line with the example set by Christ.
2. The Christian life is a process of “being conformed to Christ,” in which the outward aspects of the believer's life are brought into line with the inward relationship to Christ, established through faith. This approach is characteristic of writers such as Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–64), and is based on the idea of God conforming the believer to the likeness of Christ through the process of renewal and regeneration brought about by the Holy Spirit.

The Eschatological Dimension of Salvation

A final issue which must be addressed at this early stage concerns the chronology of salvation. Is salvation to be understood as something which has happened to the believer? Or is it something currently happening? Or is there an eschatological dimension to it – in other words, is there something which has yet to happen? The only answer to such questions that can be given on the basis of the New Testament is that salvation includes past, present, and future reference. We may illustrate this by considering Paul's statements on justification and related themes.

In dealing with Paul, it is tempting to adopt a simplistic approach to the chronological question just noted. For example, one could attempt to force justification, sanctification, and salvation into a neat past–present–future framework, as follows:

1. Justification: a past event, with present implications (sanctification).
2. Sanctification: a present event which is dependent upon the past event of justification and the future event of salvation.
3. Salvation: a future event, already anticipated and partially experienced in the past event of justification and the present event of sanctification, and dependent upon them.

But this is clearly inadequate. Justification has a future, as well as a past (Romans 2: 13, 8: 33; Galatians 5: 4–5), and appears to relate to both the beginning of the Christian life and its final consummation. Similarly, sanctification can also refer to a past event (1 Corinthians 6: 11) or a future event (1 Thessalonians 5: 23). And salvation is an exceptionally complex idea, embracing not simply a future event but something which has happened in the past (Romans 8: 24; 1 Corinthians 15: 2) or which is taking place now (1 Corinthians 1: 18).

Paul uses the language of justification to refer to both the inauguration of the life of faith and its final consummation. It is a complex and all-embracing notion, which anticipates the verdict of the final judgment (Romans 8: 30–4), declaring in advance the verdict of ultimate acquittal. The believer's present justified Christian existence is thus an anticipation of, and advance participation in, deliverance from the wrath to come, and an assurance in the present of the final eschatological verdict of acquittal (Romans 5: 9–10).

In dealing with the Christian understanding of salvation, we must therefore appreciate that it has past, present, and future elements. It is not simply a future hope, nor is it simply a past achievement. It is about a past event which secures the foundation of salvation; the present-day assurance that something has happened which transforms the believer's relationship to God and to others; and the fact that something remains to be achieved, in terms of both personal transformation and the consummation of the believer's hopes in the New Jerusalem. Or, to put this in even more simple terms: the Christian understanding of salvation presupposes that something has happened, that something is now happening, and that something further will still happen to believers.

The Foundations of Salvation: The Cross of Christ

“Theory of the atonement” has become commonplace in English-language theology as a term for “a way of understanding the work of Christ.” The term was used especially extensively in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. However, there is increasing evidence that this term is seen as cumbersome and unhelpful by many modern Christian writers, across the entire spectrum of theological viewpoints. In view of this trend, it is noted but not commended or used much in the present work. The term “soteriology” (from the Greek soteria, “salvation”) is increasingly used to refer to what were traditionally designated “theories of the atonement” or “the work of Christ.” Soteriology embraces two broad areas of theology: the question of how salvation is possible and, in particular, how it relates to the history of Jesus Christ; and the question of how “salvation” itself is to be understood. These questions have been the subject of intense discussion throughout Christian history, especially during the modern period.

Discussions of the meaning of the cross and resurrection of Christ are best grouped around four central controlling themes or images. It must be stressed that these are not mutually exclusive, and that it is normal to find writers adopting approaches which incorporate elements drawn from more than one such category. Indeed, it can be argued that the views of most writers on this subject cannot be reduced to or confined within a single category without doing serious violence to their ideas.

Four main approaches to interpreting the death of Christ can be seen within the history of Christian theology. These are best seen as intellectual frameworks which position the death of Christ, and enable its significance to be understood.

1. Approaches that build on the Old Testament's cultic worship, especially sacrifice, as a way of enabling people to enter into the presence of God. Christ is often interpreted as both the sinless High Priest and the perfect sacrificial offering, allowing impurities to be cleansed so that people can draw close to God.
2. Approaches which interpret the death and resurrection of Christ as victory over sin, death, and Satan, liberating believers from their influence and presence.
3. Approaches to the atonement that see Christ's death as a "satisfaction," through which Christ paid the penalty for sin and thus made forgiveness of human sin morally possible.
4. Approaches to the atonement that foreground the theme of love, interpreting the incarnation and atonement as a demonstration of God's commitment to humanity.

These four approaches are neither inconsistent nor independent, and are best seen as partial and potentially complementary accounts of the significance of the death of Christ, each requiring supplementation to ensure that the full picture is grasped. We begin by considering approaches to the work of Christ that deploy the imagery and concepts of the sacrificial system of ancient Israel.

The Cross as a Sacrifice

The New Testament draws extensively on Old Testament imagery and expectations, partly because Christianity emerged from within Judaism and partly because the anticipated readership of the New Testament was largely Jewish. It was therefore natural that New Testament writers would portray and interpret Christ's death upon the cross as a sacrifice. In particular, Paul's use of the Greek term hilasterion (Romans 3: 25), often translated as "propitiation," points to a sacrificial interpretation of Christ's death. Christ's death is to be seen as an effective and perfect sacrifice which was able to accomplish the forgiveness which the sacrifices of the Old Testament were only able to anticipate, rather than achieve.

This approach is especially associated with the Letter to the Hebrews, a New Testament writing which presents Christ as both the true High Priest and as the perfect sacrifice for sin. On the Jewish "Day of Atonement," the High Priest sacrificed a bull for his own sinfulness and a goat for the sins of the people. The Letter to the Hebrews argues that Jesus Christ is to be seen as the supreme High Priest in relation to whom all previous priests and priestly institutions are figures and anticipations.

This idea is developed subsequently within the Christian tradition. In order for humanity to be restored to God, the mediator must sacrifice himself; without this sacrifice, such restoration is an impossibility. Athanasius (c.293–373), writing in the fourth century, argues that Christ's sacrifice was superior to those required under the Old Covenant in several respects:

Christ offers a sacrifice which is trustworthy, of permanent effect, and which is unfailing in its nature. The sacrifices which were offered according to the Law were not trustworthy, since they had to be offered every day, and were again in need of purification. In contrast, the Savior's sacrifice was offered once only, and was accomplished in its entirety, and can thus be relied upon permanently.

This point is developed further in Athanasius's Festal Letters, written annually in celebration of the feast of Easter. Athanasius uses these letters to set out and explain the Christian understanding of Christ's sacrifice on the cross. In his seventh Festal Letter (written in 335), Athanasius explored the idea of Christ's sacrifice in terms of the Passover sacrifice of the lamb. Jews sacrificed a lamb to mark the Passover, commemorating the great redemptive act of the Exodus in which God delivered Israel from captivity in Egypt. Christians see Christ as the true Passover lamb, whose sacrifice brought about a new divine act of redemption, delivering humanity from sin and death.

[Christ], being truly of God the Father, became incarnate for our sakes, so that he might offer himself to the Father in our place, and redeem us through his offering and sacrifice. [...] This is he who, in former times, was sacrificed as a Lamb, having been foreshadowed in that lamb. But afterwards, he was slain for us. "For Christ, our passover, is sacrificed" (1 Corinthians 5: 7).

Augustine of Hippo (354–430) declared that Christ "was made a sacrifice for sin, offering himself as a whole burnt offering on the cross of his passion." Augustine brought new clarity to the whole discussion of the nature of Christ's sacrifice through his crisp and highly influential definition of a sacrifice, set out in The City of God: "A true sacrifice is offered in every action which is designed to unite us to God in a holy fellowship." On the basis of this definition, Augustine has no difficulties in speaking of Christ's death as a sacrifice: "By his death, which is indeed the one and most true sacrifice offered for us, he purged, abolished, and extinguished whatever guilt there was by which the principalities and powers lawfully detained us to pay the penalty.” In this sacrifice, Christ was both victim and priest; he offered himself up as a sacrifice: “He offered sacrifice for our sins. And where did he find that offering, the pure victim that he would offer? He offered himself, in that he could find no other.”

This understanding of the sacrifice of Christ would become of decisive importance throughout the Middle Ages, and would shape western understandings of Christ's death. In view of Augustine's importance, we may cite in full the passage which is often singled out as the most succinct expression of his thoughts on this matter:

Thus the true Mediator, who “took the form of a servant” and was thus made “the mediator between God and humanity, the person Christ Jesus” (1 Timothy 2: 5), receives the sacrifice in the “form of God” (Philippians 2: 6–8), in union with the Father, with whom he is one God. And yet, in the “form of a servant,” he determined to be himself that sacrifice, rather than to receive it, in order to prevent anyone from thinking that such a sacrifice should be offered to any creature. Thus he is both the priest, who made the offering himself, and the oblation.

Hugh of St. Victor (c.1096–1141), writing in the early twelfth century, found the imagery of “sacrifice” helpful in explaining the inner logic of the workings of Christ's death on the cross. Christ was able to be an effective sacrifice for human sin precisely because he was able to bring our fallen sinful nature before God:

From our nature, he took a victim for our nature, so that the whole burnt offering which was offered up might come from that which is ours. He did this so that the redemption to be offered might have a connection with us, through its being taken from what is ours. We are truly made to be partakers in this redemption if we are united through faith to the redeemer who has entered into fellowship with us through his flesh.

The efficacy of Christ's sacrifice thus rested on his humanity, as well as his divinity.

The sacrificial offering of Christ on the cross came to be linked especially with one aspect of the “threefold office of Christ” (munus triplex Christi). According to this typology, which dates from the middle of the sixteenth century, the work of Christ could be summarized under three “offices”: prophet (by which Christ declares the will of God); priest (by which he makes sacrifice for sin); and king (by which he rules with authority over his people).

This understanding of the threefold office of Christ was formalized during the seventeenth century and is given full justification in the writings of Protestant theologians of this period. The noted seventeenth-century Genevan theologian François Turretini (1623–87), a major exponent of the Reformed tradition, here sets out this understanding more fully:

This mediatorial office of Christ is distributed among three functions, which are individual parts of it: the prophetic, priestly, and kingly. [...] The threefold misery of humanity resulting from sin (that is, ignorance, guilt, and the oppression and bondage of sin) required this threefold office. Ignorance is healed through the prophetic office, guilt through the priestly, and the oppression and bondage of sin through the kingly. The prophetic light scatters the darkness of error; the merit of the priest removes guilt and obtains reconciliation for us; the power of the king takes away the bondage of sin and death. The prophet shows God to us; the priest leads us to God; and the king joins us together with God, and glorifies us with him. The prophet illuminates the mind by the spirit of enlightenment; the priest soothes the heart and conscience by the spirit of consolation; the king subdues rebellious inclinations by the spirit of sanctification.

The general acceptance of this taxonomy within Protestantism in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries led to a sacrificial understanding of Christ's death becoming of central importance within Protestant soteriologies. Thus, John Pearson's (1613–86) Exposition of the Creed (1659) insists upon the necessity of the sacrifice of Christ in redemption, and specifically links this with the priestly office of Christ:

The redemption or salvation which the Messiah was to bring consisteth in the freeing of a sinner from the state of sin and eternal death into a state of righteousness and eternal life. Now a freedom from sin could not be wrought without a sacrifice propitiatory, and therefore there was a necessity of a priest.

Since the Enlightenment, however, there has been a subtle shift in the meaning of the term “sacrifice.” A metaphorical extension of meaning has come to be given priority over the original. Whereas the term originally referred to the ritual offering of slaughtered animals as a specifically religious action, it increasingly came to mean heroic or costly action on the part of individuals, especially the giving up of one's life, with no transcendent reference or expectation.

This trend may be seen developing in John Locke's (1632–1704) Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), written at the dawn of the “Age of Reason.” Locke argues that the only article of faith required of Christians is that of belief in Christ's messiahship; the idea of a sacrifice for sin is studiously set to one side. “The faith required was to believe Jesus to be the Messiah, the anointed, who had been promised by God to the world. [...] I do not remember that Christ anywhere assumes to himself the title of a priest, or mentions anything relating to his priesthood.”

These arguments were taken further by the Deist writer Thomas Chubb (1679–1747), especially in his True Gospel of Jesus Christ Vindicated (1739). Arguing that the true religion of reason was that of conformity to the eternal rule of right, Chubb argues that the idea of Christ's death as a sacrifice arises from the apologetic concerns of the early Christian writers, which led them to harmonize this religion of reason with the cult of the Jews: “As the Jews had their temple, their altar, their high priest, their sacrifices and the like, so the apostles, in order to make Christianity bear a resemblance to Judaism, found out something or other in Christianity, which they by a figure of speech called by those names.” Chubb, in common with the emerging Enlightenment tradition, dismissed this as spurious. “God's disposition to show mercy [...] arises wholly from his own innate goodness or mercifulness, and not from anything external to him, whether it be the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ or otherwise.”

Even Joseph Butler (1692–1752), the noted English critic of Deism, found himself encountering difficulties while attempting to reinstate the notion of sacrifice in his Analogy of Religion (1736). In defending the sacrificial nature of Christ's death to the strongly rationalist spirit of the age, he found himself obliged to concede more than he cared to:

How and in what particular way [the death of Christ] had this efficacy, there are not wanting persons who have endeavoured to explain; but I do not find that Scripture has explained it. We seem to be very much in the dark concerning the manner in which the ancients understood atonements to be made, i.e. pardon to be obtained by sacrifice.

Horace Bushnell's (1802–76) Vicarious Sacrifice (1866) illustrates this same trend in the Anglo-American theology of the period, but in a more constructive manner. Through his suffering, Christ awakens our sense of guilt. His vicarious sacrifice demonstrates that God suffers on account of evil. In speaking of the “tender appeals of sacrifice,” Bushnell might seem to align himself with purely exemplarist understandings of the death of Christ; however, Bushnell is adamant that there are objective elements to atonement. Christ's death affects God and expresses God. There are strong anticipations of later theologies of the suffering of God, when Bushnell declares:

Whatever we may say or hold or believe concerning the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, we are to affirm in the same manner of God. The whole Deity is in it, in it from eternity. [...] There is a cross in God before the wood is seen on the hill. [...] It is as if there were a cross unseen, standing on its undiscovered hill, far back in the ages.

The use of sacrificial imagery has become noticeably less widespread since 1945, especially in German-language theology. It is highly likely that this relates directly to the rhetorical debasement of the term in secular contexts, especially in situations of national emergency. The secular use of the imagery of sacrifice, often degenerating into little more than slogan-mongering, is widely regarded as having tainted and compromised both the word and the concept. The frequent use of such phrases as “he sacrificed his life for King and country” in Britain during the First World War, and Adolf Hitler's extensive use of sacrificial imagery in justifying economic hardship and the loss of civil liberties as the price of German national revival in the late 1930s, served to render the term virtually unusable for many in Christian teaching and preaching, on account of its negative associations. Nevertheless, the idea continues to be of importance in modern Catholic sacramental theology, which continues to regard the Eucharist as a sacrifice and finds in this notion a rich source of theological imagery.

We now turn to consider the motif of victory over sin and death in Christian thinking on the meaning of the death and resurrection of Christ. An integral theme of the early Christian proclamation was that, by his death and resurrection, Christ was able to “free those who all their lives were held in slavery by the fear of death” (Hebrews 2: 15). So how is this theme incorporated into theological accounts of the work of Christ?

The Cross as a Victory

The New Testament and early church laid considerable emphasis upon the victory gained by Christ over sin, death, and Satan through his cross and resurrection. This theme of victory, often linked liturgically with the Easter celebrations, was of major importance within the western Christian theological tradition until the Enlightenment. The motif of “Christ the victor” (Christus victor) brought together a series of related themes, centering on the idea of a decisive victory over forces of evil and oppression. In one sense, this is not a “theory of the atonement.” It is much more an expression of confidence in the difference that Christ's death and resurrection have made. This may well precede, or be the basis of, a theory of the atonement – but it is not a theory itself.

The image of Christ's death as a ransom came to be of central importance to Greek patristic writers, such as Irenaeus. We noted earlier, in discussing the theological role of analogies (pp. 165–7), that the New Testament speaks of Jesus giving his life as a “ransom” for sinners (Mark 10: 45; 1 Timothy 2: 6). Origen (c.185–c.254), perhaps the most speculative of the early patristic writers, believed that this analogy could legitimately be pressed to its limits. If Christ's death was a ransom, Origen argued, it must have been paid to someone. But to whom? It could not have been paid to God, in that it was not God who was holding sinners to ransom. Therefore, Origen argued, it had to be paid to the devil.

Gregory the Great (c.540–604) developed this idea still further in the late sixth century. The devil, Gregory argued, had acquired rights over fallen humanity which God was obliged to respect. The only means by which humanity could be released from this satanic domination and oppression was through the devil exceeding the limits of his authority and thus being obliged to forfeit his rights. So how could this be achieved? Gregory suggests that it could come about if a sinless person were to enter the world, yet in the form of a normal sinful person. The devil would not notice until it was too late: in claiming authority over this sinless person, the devil would have overstepped the limits of his authority and thus be obliged to forfeit his rights.

Gregory suggests the image of a baited hook: Christ's humanity is the bait and his divinity the hook. The devil, like a great sea monster, snaps at the bait – and then discovers, too late, the hook. “The bait tempts in order that the hook may wound. Our Lord therefore, when coming for the redemption of humanity, made a kind of hook of himself for the death of the devil.” Other writers explored other images for the same idea – that of trapping the devil. Christ's death was like a net for catching birds, or a trap for catching mice. It was this aspect of this approach to the meaning of the cross that caused the most disquiet subsequently. It seemed that God was guilty of deception.

This theme is probably best seen in the writings of Rufinus of Aquileia (c.340–410, also known as Tyrannius Rufinus). Although Rufinus was noted mainly as a translator of Greek theological works into Latin, he was also an accomplished theologian in his own right. In his discussion of the meaning of the death of Christ, set out in his exposition of the Apostles' Creed dating from around the year 400, Rufinus offered a classic statement of the "Satanic entrapment" theory of the atonement:

[The purpose of the Incarnation] was that the divine virtue of the Son of God might be like a kind of hook hidden beneath the form of human flesh [...] to lure on the prince of this world to a contest; that the Son might offer him his human flesh as a bait and that the divinity which lay underneath might catch him and hold him fast with its hook. [...] Then, just as a fish when it seizes a baited hook not only fails to drag off the bait but is itself dragged out of the water to serve as food for others; so he that had the power of death seized the body of Jesus in death, unaware of the hook of divinity which lay hidden inside. Having swallowed it, he was immediately caught. The gates of hell were broken, and he was, as it were, drawn up from the pit, to become food for others.

The imagery of victory over the devil proved to have enormous popular appeal. The medieval idea of "the harrowing of hell" bears witness to its power. According to this, after dying upon the cross, Christ descended to hell and broke down its gates in order that the imprisoned souls might go free. The idea rested (rather tenuously, it has to be said) upon 1 Peter 3: 18–22, which makes reference to Christ "preaching to the spirits in prison." The hymn "Ye Choirs of New Jerusalem," written by Fulbert of Chartres (c.960–1028), expresses this theme in two of its verses, picking up the theme of Christ as the "lion of Judah" (Revelation 5: 5) defeating Satan, the serpent (Genesis 3: 15):

For Judah's lion bursts his chains
Crushing the serpent's head;
And cries aloud through death's domain
To wake the imprisoned dead.
Devouring depths of hell their prey
At his command restore;
His ransomed hosts pursue their way
Where Jesus goes before.

A similar idea is found in William Langland's (c.1330–c.1400) Piers the Plowman, one of the most important English-language poems of the fourteenth century. In this poem, Piers falls asleep and dreams of Christ throwing open the gates of Hell and speaking the following words to Satan:

Here is my soul as a ransom for all these sinful souls, to redeem those that are worthy. They are mine; they came from me, and therefore I have the better claim on them. [...] You, by falsehood and crime and against all justice, took away what was mine, in my own domain; I, in fairness, recover them by paying the ransom, and by no other means. What you got by guile is won back by grace. [...] And as a tree caused Adam and all mankind to die, so my gallows-tree shall bring them back to life.

Notice, by the way, how the text uses the theme of recapitulation – note the parallel between “tree” and “gallows-tree” – in a manner very similar to Irenaeus of Lyons.

With the advent of the Enlightenment, however, the Christus victor approach began to fall out of theological favor, increasingly being regarded as outmoded and unsophisticated. However great the popular appeal of the “harrowing of hell” may have been to medieval popular culture, it was regarded as crude and primitive by the rationalists of the Enlightenment. The following factors appear to have contributed to this development.

1. Rational criticism of belief in the resurrection of Christ (p. 242) raised doubts concerning whether one could even begin to speak of a “victory” over death.
2. The imagery traditionally linked with this approach to the cross – such as the existence of a personal devil in the form of Satan, and the domination of human existence by oppressive or satanic forces of sin and evil – was dismissed as premodern superstition.

The rehabilitation of this approach in the modern period is usually dated to 1931, with the appearance of Christus victor, by Gustaf Aulén (1879–1977). This short work, which originally appeared in German as an article in Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie (1930), has exercised a major influence over English-language approaches to the subject. Aulén argued that the classical Christian conception of the work of Christ was summed up in the belief that the risen Christ had brought new possibilities of life to humanity through his victory over the powers of evil. In a brief and very compressed account of the history of theories of the atonement, Aulén argued that this highly dramatic “classical” theory had dominated Christianity until the Middle Ages, when more abstract legal theories began to gain ground. A new concern for the morality of atonement led to a focus on justice-centered theories of the atonement, with a gradual loss of interest in the more morally problematic Christus victor approach. The situation was radically reversed in the writings of Martin Luther, who reintroduced the theme, perhaps as a reaction to what he regarded as the spiritual aridity of some later scholastic theories of the atonement. However, Aulén argued, the scholastic concerns of later Protestant orthodoxy led to its being relegated once more to the background. Aulén declared that it was time to reverse this process and to rediscover the theory, which deserved a full and proper hearing in the modern period.

In setting out the merits of this theory, Aulén drew a distinction between what he called the “classical,” or Christus victor, approach, and the two other approaches which he argued had gained currency in modern theology: a purely “objective” approach, which focused on the atonement as marking a change in God, and a purely “subjective” approach, which regarded the atonement as bringing about a change within the subjective human consciousness. Aulén argued that the former is associated with Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109) and the latter with Peter Abelard (1079–1142). The Christus victor model is, in Aulén's view, to be distinguished from both these approaches.

Its central theme is the idea of the Atonement as a divine conflict and victory; Christ – Christus Victor – fights against and triumphs over the evil powers of the world, the “tyrants” under which mankind is in bondage and suffering, and in Him God reconciles the world to Himself. Two points here require to be pressed with special emphasis: first, that this is a doctrine of atonement in the full and proper sense, and second, that this idea of the atonement has a clear and distinct character of its own, quite different from the other two types.

It was not long before the historical foundations of Aulén's approach were called into question. Its claims to be treated as the “classical” theory of the atonement had clearly been overstated. The idea of Christ as the victor over death and Satan was indeed an important component of the general patristic understanding of the nature of salvation; however, it was just one image or approach among many others. Aulén had exaggerated its importance for patristic writers. His critics pointed out that, if any theory could justly lay claim to the title of “the classical theory of the atonement,” it would be the notion of redemption through unity with Christ.

Nevertheless, Aulén's views were sympathetically received. In part, this reflects growing disenchantment with the Enlightenment worldview in general; more fundamentally, perhaps, it represents a growing realization of the reality of evil in the world, fostered by the horrors of the First World War. The insights of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), which drew attention to the manner in which adults could be spiritually imprisoned by the hidden forces within their subconscious, raised serious doubts about the Enlightenment view of the total rationality of human nature and lent new credibility to the idea that humans are held in bondage to unknown and hidden forces. Aulén's approach seemed to resonate with a growing awareness of the darker side of human nature. It had become intellectually respectable to talk about “forces of evil.”

Aulén's approach also offered a third possibility, which mediated between the two alternatives then on offer within mainstream liberal Protestantism – both of which were increasingly coming to be regarded as flawed. The classical legal theory was regarded as raising difficult theological questions, not least concerning the morality of atonement; the subjective approach, which regarded Christ's death as doing little more than arousing human religious sentiment, seemed to be seriously inadequate religiously. Aulén offered an approach to the meaning of the death of Christ which bypassed the difficulties of legal approaches yet vigorously defended the objective nature of the atonement. Nevertheless, Aulén's approach did raise some serious questions. It offered no rational justification for the manner in which the forces of evil are defeated through the cross of Christ. Why the cross? Why not in some other manner?

Since then, the image of victory has been developed in writings on the cross. Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) extended his program of demythologization to the New Testament theme of victory, interpreting it as a victory over inauthentic existence and unbelief. Paul Tillich (1886–1965) offered a reworking of Aulén's theory in which the victory of Christ on the cross was interpreted as a victory over existential forces which threaten to deprive us of authentic existence. Bultmann and Tillich, in adopting such existentialist approaches, thus converted a theory of the atonement which was originally radically objective into a subjective victory within the human consciousness.

In his Past Event and Present Salvation (1989), Oxford theologian Paul Fiddes (born 1947) emphasized that the notion of “victory” retains a place of significance within Christian thinking about the cross. Christ's death does more than impart some new knowledge to us, or express old ideas in new manners. It makes possible a new mode of existence:

The victory of Christ actually creates victory in us. [...] The act of Christ is one of those moments in human history that “opens up new possibilities of existence.” Once a new possibility has been disclosed, other people can make it their own, repeating and reliving the experience.

We now turn to consider the motif of forgiveness in Christian thinking on the meaning of the death and resurrection of Christ. An integral theme of the early Christian proclamation was that “everyone who believes in [Jesus Christ] receives forgiveness of sins through his name” (Acts 10: 43). So how is this theme incorporated into theories of the work of Christ?

The Cross and Forgiveness

A third approach centers on the idea of the death of Christ providing the basis by which God is enabled to forgive sin. How can a holy God forgive sin? Is it possible for a righteous God to forgive unrighteousness? Yet the Christian faith also emphasizes the graciousness and mercy of God. So how can these be held together? How can God be righteous and merciful at the same time? This third approach to the work of Christ aims to make sense of this enigma, both demonstrating the morality and rationality of faith and at the same time highlighting the idea of sin as moral guilt or imperfection.

This approach is traditionally associated with the eleventh-century writer Anselm of Canterbury, who developed an argument for the necessity of the incarnation on this basis. This model became very influential and was incorporated into many western Christian works of theology and hymns.

In part, Anselm's reason for developing this model appears to have been a deep-seated dissatisfaction with the Christus victor approach, which seemed to him to rest on a series of highly questionable assumptions about the “rights of the devil” (ius diaboli) and an implicit suggestion that God acted with less than total honesty in redeeming humanity. Anselm was unable to understand why the devil can be said to have “rights” of any kind over fallen humanity, let alone why God should be under any obligation to respect them.

At best, Anselm suggests, the devil might be allowed to have a de facto power over humanity – a power which exists as a matter of fact, even if it is an illegitimate and unjustified power. Yet this cannot be thought of as a de jure authority – that is, an authority firmly grounded in some legal or moral principle. “I do not see what force this has,” he comments, in dismissing the idea. Equally, Anselm is dismissive of any notion that God deceives the devil in the process of redemption. The entire trajectory of redemption is grounded in and reflects the righteousness of God. Anselm's emphasis falls totally upon the righteousness of God. God redeems humanity in a manner that is totally consistent with the divine quality of righteousness.

Anselm's treatise Why God became Man (1099) is a sustained engagement with the question of the possibility of human redemption, cast in the form of a dialogue. In view of its enormous influence on western theories of the atonement, both Catholic and Protestant, we must explore it in some detail. In the course of his analysis, Anselm argues for both the necessity of the incarnation and the saving potential of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The argument is complex, and can be summarized as follows:

1. God created humanity in a state of original righteousness, with the objective of bringing humanity to a state of eternal blessedness.
2. That state of eternal blessedness is contingent upon human obedience to God. However, through sin, humanity is unable to achieve this necessary obedience, which appears to frustrate God's purpose in creating humanity in the first place.
3. In that it is impossible for God's purposes to be frustrated, there must be some means by which the situation can be remedied. However, the situation can only be remedied if a satisfaction is made for sin. In other words, something has to be done by which the offense caused by human sin can be purged.
4. There is no way in which humanity can provide this necessary satisfaction. It lacks the resources which are needed. On the other hand, God possesses the resources needed to provide the required satisfaction.
5. A "God-man" would possess both the ability (as God) and the obligation (as a human being) to pay the required satisfaction. Therefore, the incarnation takes place, in order that the required satisfaction may be made, and humanity redeemed. Anselm also makes the additional point that Christ's obedience to God during his life and in his death endowed his sacrifice with sufficient merit to redeem human nature at large – a theme that would be developed considerably in later writings on this theme.

A number of points in Anselm's account need further comment. First, Anselm does not offer a trinitarian account of atonement. There is no involvement of the Holy Spirit in this process. Furthermore, Anselm works with an "over-against" framework, pitting the Father against the Son and failing to articulate the continuity of divine action between Father and Son.

Second, note how sin is conceived as an offense against God. The weight of that offense appears to be proportional to the status of the offended party. For many scholars, this suggests that Anselm was deeply influenced by the feudal assumptions of his time, perhaps regarding God as the equivalent of the “lord of the manor.” It is, however, much more likely that Anselm was merely using such ways of thinking as analogies familiar to his age; it is clear that his fundamental line of thought is to be found in the Christian tradition itself.

Third, Anselm tends to conceive of sin as something that can be deleted – like a debt – through Christ's death. Anselm shows little awareness that sin might be an ongoing issue – something that requires both forgiveness and purging or healing. Sin is treated in almost economic terms, as a certain quantity of “offense” that needs to be counterbalanced by an equally large “merit.”

Fourth, Anselm seems to argue that redemption is a necessity – in other words, that Christ's death was required in order to effect human salvation. In taking this view, he is in a minority. We may be able to make sense of Christ's death as the basis of salvation, but that does not mean that it had to happen this way. As the Canadian Jesuit writer Bernard Lonergan (1904–84) pointed out, intelligibility is not the same as necessity. For leading theologians such as Augustine, Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), and Duns Scotus (1266–1308), God could have redeemed us by other means. We may be able to understand why God chose to act in this way; we cannot assume, however, that such considerations forced God to redeem humanity in this specific manner.

Fifth, there has been considerable debate over the origins of the idea of a “satisfaction.” It is possible that the idea may derive from the Germanic laws of the period, which stipulated that an offense had to be purged through an appropriate payment. However, most scholars believe that Anselm was appealing directly to the existing penitential system of the church. A sinner, seeking penance, was required to confess every sin. In pronouncing forgiveness, the priest would require that the penitent should do something (such as go on a pilgrimage or undertake some charitable work) as a “satisfaction” – that is, a means of publicly demonstrating gratitude for forgiveness. It is possible that Anselm derived the idea from this source.

The theological basis of the notion of “satisfaction” was developed further in the thirteenth century by Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas grounds the adequacy of the “satisfaction of Christ” to compensate for human sin on three basic considerations:

A proper satisfaction comes about when someone offers to the person offended something which gives him a delight greater than his hatred of the offense. Now Christ by suffering as a result of love and obedience offered to God something greater than what might be exacted in compensation for the whole offence of humanity; firstly, because of the greatness of the love, as a result of which he suffered; secondly, because of the worth of the life which he laid down for a satisfaction, which was the life of God and of a human being; thirdly, because of the comprehensiveness of his passion and the greatness of the sorrow which he took upon himself.

Two aspects of this argument are of particular importance. Aquinas's first point (the extent of Christ's love) is clearly intended to incorporate Peter Abelard's emphasis on the significance of the love shown by Christ in dying on the cross (see p. 264). Second, Aquinas follows Anselm in arguing that the inherent worth of Christ's death is grounded in his divinity. Why is Christ's death so significant, and possessed of a capacity to redeem us? Because, Aquinas argues, he – and he alone – is God incarnate. As Aquinas puts it, “the worth of Christ's flesh is to be reckoned, not just according to the nature of flesh but according to the person who assumed it, in that it was the flesh of God, from whom it gained an infinite worth.” In response to the question of why the death of one person should have possessed such saving significance, Aquinas points out that Christ's significance in this matter does not rest on his humanity but on his divinity.

Nevertheless, despite this emphasis on the divinity of Christ, it is clear that Aquinas has taken care to ensure that the importance of the humanity of Christ should not be overlooked. The first and third of his three considerations can each be argued to give a significant place to Christ's humanity in the process of redemption, by stressing the saving importance of Christ's love and suffering. Anselm tended to treat Christ's humanity as little more than the means by which Christ was able to justly bear the penalty due for human sin; Aquinas is thus able to offer a more positive assessment of the soteriological role of the humanity of Christ.

However, despite the obvious difficulties that attend Anselm's approach, an important advance had been made. Anselm's insistence that God is totally and utterly obliged to act according to the principles of justice throughout the redemption of humanity marks a decisive break with the dubious morality of the Christus victor view. In taking up Anselm's approach, later writers were able to place it on a more secure foundation by grounding it in the general principles of law. The sixteenth century was particularly appreciative of the importance of human law, and saw it as an appropriate model for God's forgiveness of human sin. Three main models came to be used at this time to understand the manner in which the forgiveness of human sins is related to the death of Christ.

Anselm's approach had a significant impact on the hymnody of the western church. It is clearly seen in the Good Friday hymn "There Is a Green Hill Far Away":

There was no other good enough
To pay the price of sin;
He only could unlock the gate
Of heaven, and let us in.

Although this approach has been very influential in the western church, it is seen as theologically deficient by theologians of the Orthodox church. Vladimir Lossky (1903–58) had multiple concerns about Anselm's theory of the atonement, of which we shall note three. In the first place, Lossky saw this as an attempt to rationalize the mystery of redemption, which ended up impoverishing it. Like many Orthodox writers, Lossky believed that mysteries ought to be respected and revered, and not reduced to inadequate rational formulations. Second, Lossky argued that redemption should not show such a preoccupation with human sin but should focus instead on the goal of salvation – namely, deification. And finally, Lossky suggested that Anselm's account of the work of Christ is reductionist, focusing on reflection on the significance of Christ's death and failing to do justice, rationally or imaginatively, to his resurrection.

With the onset of the Enlightenment, this general approach to the atonement was subjected to a radical critique. The following major points of criticism were directed against it:

1. It appeared to rest upon a notion of original guilt, which Enlightenment writers found unacceptable. Each human being was responsible for his or her own moral guilt; the very notion of an inherited guilt, as it was expressed in the traditional doctrine of original sin, was to be rejected.
2. The Enlightenment insisted upon the rationality, and perhaps above all the morality, of every aspect of Christian doctrine. This theory of the atonement appeared to be morally suspect to those committed to the Enlightenment worldview, especially in its notions of transferred guilt or merit. The central idea of “vicarious satisfaction” was also regarded with acute suspicion: in what sense was it moral for one human being to bear the penalties due for another?

These criticisms were given added weight through the development of the discipline of the “history of dogma” (see pp. 181–2). The representatives of this movement, from Gotthilf Samuel Steinbart (1738–1809) through to Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930), argued that a series of assumptions, each of central importance to the Anselmian doctrine of penal substitution, had become incorporated into Christian theology by what were little more than historical accidents. For example, in his System of Pure Philosophy (1778), Steinbart argued that historical investigation disclosed the intrusion of three “arbitrary assumptions” into Christian reflection on salvation:

1. the Augustinian doctrine of original sin;
2. the concept of satisfaction;
3. the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

For such reasons, Steinbart felt able to declare the substructure of orthodox Protestant thinking on the atonement to be a relic of a bygone era.

More recently, the idea of guilt – a central aspect of legal approaches to soteriology – has been the subject of much discussion, especially in the light of the influential Austrian psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud's views on the origin of guilt in childhood experiences. For some twentieth-century writers, “guilt” is simply a psychosocial projection whose origins lie not in the holiness of God but in the muddleheadedness of human nature. These psychosocial structures are then, it is argued, projected onto some imaginary screen of “external” reality and treated as if they were objectively true. While this represents a considerable overstatement of the arguments, it has the advantage of clarity and allows us to gain an appreciation of the considerable pressure that this approach to the atonement is currently facing.

Others raised concerns about the notion of Christ being punished on the cross. For example, in The Nature of the Atonement (1856), the Scottish theologian John McLeod Campbell developed the idea of the “vicarious penitence” of Christ – the idea that Christ offered a perfect confession of sins on behalf of all humanity that is somehow redemptive. For Campbell, the crucified Christ is to be thought of as “seeing sin and sinners with God's eyes, and feeling in reference to them with God's heart.” The crucifixion is not about the divine imposition of “a penal infliction” upon Christ but about Christ manifesting and embodying God's hatred of sin and love for sinners. The Oxford theologian Robert C. Moberly (1845–1903) made a similar point in his Atonement and Personality (1901), arguing that “the perfect sacrifice of penitence in the sinless Christ is the true atoning sacrifice for sin.” Neither of these approaches can be considered “penal”; both, however, are substitutionary, in that Christ does something – in this case, offer penitence toward God for sin – which humanity ought to have done itself. Related views can also be found in the writings of the great Scottish theologian Thomas F. Torrance (1913–2007).

Nevertheless, the traditional view of the cross continues to find significant supporters. The collapse of the evolutionary moral optimism of liberal Protestantism in the wake of the First World War (see pp. 62–3) did much to raise again the question of human guilt and the need for redemption from outside the human situation. Two significant contributions to this discussion may be regarded as precipitated directly by the credibility crisis faced by liberal Protestantism at this time.

The Justification of God (1916), written by P. T. Forsyth (1848–1921) in England during the First World War, represents an impassioned plea to allow the notion of the “justice of God” to be rediscovered. Forsyth is less concerned than Anselm for the legal and juridical aspects of the cross; his interest centers on the manner in which the cross is inextricably linked with “the whole moral fabric and movement of the universe.” The doctrine of the atonement is inseparable from “the rightness of things.” God acts to restore this “rightness of things,” in that he makes available through the cross a means of moral regeneration – something which the war demonstrated that humanity needed yet was unable to provide for itself.

The cross is not a theological theme, nor a forensic device, but the crisis of the moral universe on a scale far greater than earthly war. It is the theodicy of the whole God dealing with the whole soul of the whole world in holy love, righteous judgement and redeeming grace.

Through the cross, God aims to restore the rightness of the world by rightful means – a central theme of Anselm's doctrine of atonement, creatively restated.

More significant is the extended discussion of the theme of “atonement” or “reconciliation” (the German term Versöhnung can bear both meanings) to be found in the Church Dogmatics of Karl Barth (1886–1968). Barth entitled his discussion of this matter “The Judge Judged in Our Place.” This title derives from the influential Reformed Heidelberg Catechism (1563), which speaks of Christ as the judge who “has represented me before the judgment of God, and has taken away all condemnation from me.” The section in question can be regarded as an extended commentary on this classic text of the Reformed tradition, dealing with the manner in which the judgment of God in the first place is made known and enacted, and, in the second, is taken upon God himself (a central Anselmian theme, even if Anselm failed to integrate it within a trinitarian context).

The entire section is steeped in the language and imagery of guilt, judgment, and forgiveness. In the cross, we can see God exercising his rightful judgment of sinful humanity. (Barth uses the compound term Sündermensch – “person of sin” – to emphasize that “sin” is not a detachable aspect of human nature.) The cross exposes human delusions of self-sufficiency and autonomy of judgment, which Barth sees encapsulated in the story of Genesis 3: “Human beings want to be their own judges.”

Yet alteration of the situation demands that its inherent wrongness be acknowledged. For Barth, the cross of Christ represents the locus in which the righteous judge makes known his judgment of sinful humanity and simultaneously takes that judgment upon himself:

What took place is that the Son of God fulfilled the righteous judgement on us human beings by himself taking our place as a human being, and in our place undergoing the judgement under which we had passed. [...] Because God willed to execute his judgement on us in his Son, it all took place in his person, as his accusation and condemnation and destruction. He judged, and it was the judge who was judged, who allowed himself to be judged. [...] Why did God become a human being? So that God as a human being might do and accomplish and achieve and complete all this for us wrongdoers, in order that in this way there might be brought about by him our reconciliation with him, and our conversion to him.

The strongly substitutionary character of this will be evident. God exercises his righteous judgment by exposing our sin, by taking it upon himself, and thus by neutralizing its power.

For Barth, the cross thus speaks both “for us” and “against us.” Unless the cross is allowed to reveal the full extent of our sin, it cannot take that sin from us:

The “for us” of his death on the cross included and encloses this terrible “against us.” Without this terrible “against us,” it would not be the divine and holy and redemptive and effectively helpful “for us,” in which the conversion of humanity and the world to God has become an event.

Legal or penal approaches to the meaning of the death of Christ have continued to be of particular importance within evangelical theology. One of the most notable features of the evangelical renaissance since the Second World War has been its focus on the contemporary exploration of New Testament understandings of the atonement, with works such as Leon Morris's (1914–2006) The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (1955) and John Stott's (1921–2011) The Cross of Christ (1986) setting out the continuing centrality of penal approaches to the cross within the evangelical understanding of the Christian faith. The general features of this approach were stated with particular clarity in 1974 by James I. Packer (born 1926):

Christ's death had its effect first on God, who was hereby propitiated (or, better, who hereby propitiated himself), and only because it had this effect did it become an overthrowing of the powers of darkness and a revealing of God's seeking and saving love. The thought here is that by dying Christ offered to God what the West has called satisfaction for sins, satisfaction which God's own character dictated as the only means whereby his "no" to us could become a "yes." [...] By undergoing the cross Jesus expiated our sins, propitiated our Maker, turned God's "no" to us into a "yes," and so saved us.

We now turn to consider the idea that Christ's death is to be seen as a manifestation and confirmation of God's love for humanity. An integral theme of the early Christian proclamation is found in Paul's declaration that "I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me" (Galatians 2: 20). So how is this theme incorporated into theories of the work of Christ?

The Cross as a Demonstration of God's Love

A central aspect of the New Testament understanding of the meaning of the cross relates to the demonstration of the love of God for humanity. A recognition that Christ's death can be seen as a demonstration of divine love can be seen at the earliest stages in the Christian theological tradition, such as the writings of Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215). Clement points out how the incarnation of Christ, and especially his death, represents a powerful affirmation of the love of God for humanity, and a demand that humanity demonstrate a comparable love for God:

For [Christ] came down, for this he assumed human nature, for this he willingly endured the sufferings of humanity, that by being reduced to the measure of our weakness, he might raise us to the measure of his power. And just before he poured out his offering, when he gave himself as a ransom, he left us a new testament: "I give you my love" (John 13: 34). What is the nature and extent of this love? For each of us he laid down his life, the life which was worth the whole universe, and he requires in return that we should do the same for each other.

Augustine of Hippo was one of many patristic writers to stress that one of the motivations underlying the mission of Christ was the "demonstration of the love of God toward us." For Augustine, this was but one element in a Christian understanding of the cross. Yet, as we shall see, it came to be given priority in some expositions of the atonement, often in response to shifting cultural norms.

Perhaps the most important medieval statement of this emphasis can be found in the writings of the medieval theologian Peter Abelard. It must be stressed that Abelard does not, as some of his interpreters suggest, reduce the meaning of the cross to a demonstration of the love of God. This is one of several components of Abelard's soteriology, which includes traditional ideas concerning Christ's death as a sacrifice for human sin. It is Abelard's emphasis upon the subjective impact of the cross that is distinctive.

For Abelard, "the purpose and cause of the incarnation was that Christ might illuminate the world by his wisdom, and excite it to love of himself." In this, Abelard restates the Augustinian idea of Christ's incarnation as a public demonstration of the extent of the love of God, with the intent of evoking a response of love from humanity. "The Son of God took our nature, and in it took upon himself to teach us by both word and example even to the point of death, thus binding us to himself through love." This insight is pressed home with considerable force, as the subjective impact of the love of God in Christ is explored further:

Love is increased by the faith which we have concerning Christ because, on account of the belief that God in Christ has united our human nature to himself, and by suffering in that same nature has demonstrated to us that supreme love of which Christ himself speaks: "Greater love has no one than this" (John 15: 13). We are thus joined through his grace to him and our neighbor by an unbreakable bond of love. [...] Therefore, our redemption through the suffering of Christ is that deeper love within us which not only frees us from slavery to sin, but also secures for us the true liberty of the children of God, in order that we might do all things out of love rather than out of fear – love for him who has shown us such grace that no greater can be found.

Abelard fails to provide an adequate theological foundation to allow us to understand precisely why Christ's death is to be understood as a demonstration of the love of God. Nevertheless, his approach to the meaning of the death of Christ brought home the powerful subjective impact of that death, which had been totally ignored by some contemporary writers, such as Anselm of Canterbury.

This theme is developed throughout Christian theology, and has clear applications in the sphere of spirituality. We find it in one of the most reflective Spanish spiritual writers of this period – Juana de la Cruz Vázquez Gutiérrez (1481–1534). Juana is noted particularly for her Book of Consolation, which was widely admired during the Spanish golden age. Although Juana never achieved the same status as other women writers of this era – such as Teresa of Avilà (1515–82) – she repays careful study, not least because of her use of vivid imagery in describing the relationship of the believer to God. Her discussion of the passion of Christ is notable in several respects, particularly her explicit use of feminine images to unlock its theological significance. The crucifixion of Christ is here compared to a woman giving birth. For Juana, reflecting on the pain and sorrow that Christ suffered in order to give life to the children of God is a powerful affirmation of the love of God for humanity – a love which is here expressed using maternal imagery:

Christ gave birth to us all with very great pains and torments at the time of his cruel and bitter passion. And since we cost him so dearly and the labor through which he gave birth to us was so grueling that it made him sweat drops of blood, he can do nothing but pray and plead for us before the Father, like a very compassionate mother [como madre muy piadosa], desiring that we should be saved and that our souls should be enlightened, so that he might not have suffered his pain and torment in vain.

The text that underlies Juana's reflections at this point is Matthew 23: 37: "Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the city that kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to it! How often have I desired to gather your children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you were not willing!" Juana finds the image of a hen gathering her chicks under her wings to be an agreeably feminine way of conceiving the love of God for humanity, and links this with Christ's death as a birthing process, which gives rise to faith in individuals, as they respond to God's love.

With the rise of the Enlightenment worldview, increasingly critical approaches were adopted to theories of the atonement which incorporated transcendent elements – such as the idea of a sacrifice which had some impact upon God, or Christ dying in order to pay some penalty or satisfaction which was due for sin. The increasingly skeptical attitude to the resurrection associated with the Enlightenment tended to discourage theologians from incorporating this element into their theologies of atonement with anything even approaching the enthusiasm of earlier generations. As a result, the emphasis of theologians sympathetic to the Enlightenment came to focus upon the cross itself.

However, many Enlightenment theologians also had difficulties with the traditional "two natures" doctrine, which affirmed that Christ was at one and the same time both perfectly human and perfectly divine. The form of Christology which perhaps expresses the spirit of the Enlightenment most faithfully is a "degree Christology" – that is to say, a Christology which recognizes a difference of degree, but not of nature, between Christ and other human beings. On this view, Jesus Christ was recognized as embodying certain qualities which are present, actually or potentially, in all other human beings, the difference lying in the superior extent to which he embodied them.

When such considerations are applied to theories of atonement, a consistent pattern begins to emerge. This can be seen in the writings of late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century rationalist theologians such as Georg Friedrich Seiler (1733–1807), Gotthilf Samuel Steinbart, and Karl Gottlieb Bretschneider (1776–1848). Its basic features can be summarized as follows.

1. The cross has no transcendent reference or value; its value resides directly and solely in its impact upon humanity. Thus, the cross represents a “sacrifice” only in that it represents Christ giving up his life.
2. The person who died upon the cross was a human being, and the impact of that death is upon human beings. That impact takes the form of inspiration and encouragement to model ourselves upon the moral example set for us in Jesus himself.
3. The only theologically valid interpretation of the cross is that it demonstrates the love of God toward us.

This approach became enormously influential in rationalist circles throughout nineteenth-century Europe. The mystery and apparent irrationalism of the cross had been neutralized; what remained was a powerful and dramatic plea for the moral improvement of humanity, on the basis of the example provided in the lifestyle and attitudes of Jesus Christ. The model of a martyr, rather than a savior, describes the attitude increasingly adopted toward Jesus within such circles.

The most significant challenge to this rationalist approach to the cross was expressed by F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834), who insisted upon the religious – as opposed to purely moral – value of the death of Christ. Christ did not die to make or endorse a moral system; he came in order that the supremacy of the consciousness of God could be established in humanity. Schleiermacher argues that redemption consists in the stimulation and elevation of the natural human God-consciousness through the “entrance of the living influence of Christ.” He attributes to Christ “an absolutely powerful God-consciousness.” This, he argues, possesses an assimilative power of such intensity that it is able to bring about the redemption of humanity.

Schleiermacher seems to have in mind something like the model of a charismatic political leader who is able to communicate his vision with such clarity and power that it is both understood by his audience and also captivates them in such a way that they are transformed by it, and come to be caught up in it. Yet it remains his idea; he has assumed others into it, without compromising his personal uniqueness, in that it is and remains his vision:

Let us now suppose that some person for the first time combines a naturally cohesive group into a civil community (legend tells of such cases in plenty); what happens is that the idea of the state first comes to consciousness in him, and takes possession of his personality as its immediate dwelling-place. Then he assumes the rest into the living fellowship of the idea. He does so by making them clearly conscious of the unsatisfactoriness of their present condition by effective speech. The power remains with the founder of forming in them the idea which is the innermost principle of his own life, and of assuming them into the fellowship of that life.

Yet this is not exemplarism, in the strict sense of the word. Schleiermacher uses two German terms – Urbildlichkeit and Vorbildlichkeit – in exploring this question, both of which are difficult to translate adequately into English.

- Urbildlichkeit may be rendered as “the quality of being an ideal.” For Schleiermacher, Jesus of Nazareth is the ideal of human God-consciousness, and the ultimate in human piety (Frömmigkeit). Taken on its own, this notion might seem to come close to the rationalist notion of Jesus as a human moral example.

Schleiermacher is able to evade this difficulty in two ways. First, he stresses that Jesus of Nazareth is not simply a moral example, someone who illustrates permanent moral truths. He is the one ideal example of a perfect human consciousness of God – a religious, rather than a purely moral or rational, idea. Second, Christ possesses the ability to communicate this God-consciousness to others, as noted above – a quality which Schleiermacher discusses in terms of Vorbildlichkeit, to which we now turn.

- Vorbildlichkeit may be translated as “the quality of being able to evoke a given ideal in others.” Jesus of Nazareth is not simply the instantiation of an ideal but one who possesses an ability to evoke or arouse this quality in others.

On the basis of this approach, Schleiermacher criticizes existing manners of conceiving the person of Christ. For Enlightenment writers, Jesus of Nazareth was merely a religious teacher of humanity, or perhaps the exemplar of a religious or moral principle. As noted earlier, this does not mean that Jesus established such principles or teachings; their authority lies in their being recognized to be consonant with rational ideas and values. The authority of Jesus is thus derivative and secondary, while that of reason is immediate and primary. Schleiermacher designates this as an “empirical” understanding of the work of Christ, which “attributes a redemptive activity on the part of Christ, but one which is held to consist only in bringing about an increasing perfection in us, and which cannot take place other than by teaching and example.” Nevertheless Schleiermacher was – and is – often represented as teaching a view of the atonement as some sort of moral elevation or transformation of life. One of the paradoxes here is that Schleiermacher's distinctive ideas ultimately proved to be capable of being interpreted as a purely exemplarist understanding of the death of Christ, rather than posing a coherent challenge to such a view.

The most significant statement of an exemplarist approach in England stems from the modernist Hastings Rashdall (1858–1924). In his The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology (1919), Rashdall launched a vigorous attack on traditional approaches to the atonement, arguing that the only interpretation of the cross which was adequate for the needs of the modern age was that already associated with the medieval writer Peter Abelard:

The church's early creed, "There is none other name given among men by which we may be saved," may be translated so as to be something of this kind: "There is none other ideal given among men by which we may be saved, except the moral ideal which Christ taught us by his words, and illustrated by his life and death of love."

Although Abelard did not actually hold precisely the opinions that Rashdall attributed to him, Rashdall's argument is actually independent of this fact. In an age which had discovered both Darwinism and biblical criticism, there no longer seemed to be a place for any understanding of Christ's death which was based upon an objective notion of sin or divine punishment. Later English writers who adopted similar or related approaches include G. W. H. Lampe (1912–80) and John Hick (1922–2012). In his essay "The Atonement: Law and Love" (1962), contributed to the liberal Catholic volume Soundings, Lampe launched a fierce attack on legal approaches to his subject, before commending an exemplarist approach based on "the paradox and miracle of love." Hick argued that the cross of Christ ought to be understood as making a universal religious possibility known. For Hick, the Christ-event is only "one of the points at which God has been and still is creatively at work within human life." The distinctiveness of Christ's death, seen in this pluralist manner, relates solely to his being a "visible story" and not an "additional truth."

The chief difficulty associated with purely exemplarist approaches to the cross concerns their understanding of human sin. The Enlightenment tended to regard the idea of "sin" as a hangover from a period of superstition, which the modern age could safely dispense with. If “sin” had any real meaning, it was that of “ignorance concerning the true nature of things.” Christ's death was thus treated as the correlative of this notion of sin – the conveying of information concerning God to a confused or ignorant humanity.

However, this idea of sin seemed rather weak and inadequate in the light of the atrocities of the Second World War, such as the extermination camp of Auschwitz. The Enlightenment belief in the fundamental goodness of human nature received a severe setback through such events. Increasing anxiety about the plausibility of the Enlightenment view of sin has brought in its wake a growing disenchantment with the Enlightenment notion of “redemption through knowledge” – including exemplarist approaches to the meaning of the death of Christ.

Violence and the Cross: The Theory of René Girard (1923–2015)

Thus far, we have tended to treat the cross of Christ in somewhat abstract, theoretical terms. Some readers might not unreasonably point out that the cross was actually an act of violence, in which suffering and death were inflicted on Christ. How can the sheer violence of the act of crucifixion be incorporated into Christian reflection on the meaning of the cross? And what does the cross have to say about the disturbing human propensity to use violence as a means of resolving its problems?

In recent years, theologians have begun to reflect on the insights of the French anthropologist René Girard, who taught for many years at Stanford University and many of whose works deal with the theme of violence. Girard offers an anthropological approach to religion which sees violence as integral to the sacred practices of all cultures and races. In his influential book Violence and the Sacred (1977), Girard defended his thesis that destructive violence is at the heart of the sacred, tracing this development through anthropological studies of sacrifice (both human and animal), mythology, and ritual. Girard finds the roots of violence in what he terms “mimetic desire” and the rivalry that this desire creates. “The rival desires the same object as the subject, and to assert the primacy of the rival can lead to only one conclusion. Rivalry does not arise because of the fortuitous convergence of the two desires on a single object; rather, the subject desires the object because the rival desires it.” As this desire escalates, it can lead to violence that can overwhelm the community and destroy it. One act of violence leads to another, escalating to the point at which it cannot be controlled. However, in this situation, violence can “be diverted to another object, something it can sink its teeth into.”

The “other object” that is turned too, according to Girard, is the sacrificial victim – a victim which Girard significantly terms the “scapegoat,” using imagery drawn from the Old Testament. This scapegoat is an innocent third party, who becomes the focus of the community's violence and the means of its transformation. The victim is not a substitute for just one individual but “a substitute for all the members of the community, offered up by the members themselves. The sacrifice serves to protect the entire community from its own violence; it prompts the entire community to choose victims outside itself.” The surrogate victim, the scapegoat, is sacrificed on behalf of the community, so that the violence unleashed is diverted and the community is saved. “The purpose of the sacrifice is to restore harmony to the community, to reinforce the social fabric.”

So how does this relate to Christian understandings of the atonement? After all, the New Testament does not use the scapegoat imagery to refer to the death of Christ. Girard has an answer:

“But never,” you will tell me, “does the New Testament resort to the term ‘scapegoat’ to designate Jesus as the innocent victim of an escalation of mimetic contagion.” You are right, no doubt, but it does use an expression equal and even superior to “scapegoat,” and this is lamb of God. It eliminates the negative attributes and unsympathetic connotations of the goat. Thereby it better corresponds to the idea of an innocent victim sacrificed unjustly.

Girard's analysis is potentially of importance in helping us to understand how an act of violence leads to a community which is characterized by its emphasis on reconciliation and peace. Christ's atonement is the fundamental prerequisite for a nonviolent community – the church. Girard recently remarked that he had set out on a “search for the anthropology of the Cross, which turns out to rehabilitate orthodox theology.” While Girard himself does not claim to provide an adequate alternative theological model of the atonement, he can be argued to illuminate both the nature of the human situation, which is characterized by violence (according to Genesis, the fall led immediately to violence and murder), and the nature of divine redemption (by providing a means by which this addictive and self-perpetuating cycle of violence can be ended). Girard does not offer a foundation for a Christian doctrine of atonement; he does, however, offer illumination of some of its core themes.

“Can a Male Savior Save Women?” Feminists on Atonement

Jesus of Nazareth was a male Jew who lived at a specific moment in history and inhabited a specific culture. So how can this specific individual have universal significance? Part of the Christian answer is given by the doctrine of the incarnation, which affirms the importance of Jesus of Nazareth for all times, races, genders, nations, and cultures. The rise of feminism has, however, seen this question reopened. In 1983, the leading Catholic feminist theologian Rosemary Radford Ruether (born 1936) opened a chapter of her book Sexism and God-Talk with the question: “Can a male savior save women?” This sharply posed question has generated considerable discussion.

Ruether herself took the view that the maleness of Jesus of Nazareth was not of decisive importance in this matter. What really mattered was his liberating prophetic message. The message is primary; the messenger secondary. More radical feminists disagreed. Daphne Hampson (born 1944) and Mary Daly (1928–2010) both answered the question in the negative, though for different reasons. Hampson pointed to the dominance of male imagery within the Christian tradition, and further questioned whether a particular individual could have universal significance. Daly focused on the situation of women, arguing that they needed to be saved from men rather than by a man.

Yet feminist discussion of the atonement has moved on beyond the specific question of the maleness of Christ as savior. Increasingly, the mode of redemption has become the focus of attention, with particular criticism being directed against ideas such as substitutionary atonement and a sacrificial death. For example, Beverly W. Harrison (1932–2012) and Carter Heyward (born 1945) speak of the “sodomasochism” implicit in Anselm of Canterbury's theory of the atonement, which is analyzed in terms of authorized violence and social domination. God is the sadist who inflicts punishment and Jesus the masochist who willingly accepts it. Joanne Brown and Rebecca Parker argue that the idea of a Father sending his son to suffer and die on a cross promotes an “abusive theology” that amounts to “child abuse” and “glorifies suffering.” “Is it any wonder that there is so much abuse in modern society when the predominant image or theology of the culture is of ‘divine child abuse’ – God the Father demanding and carrying out the suffering and death of his own son?” Accordingly, the death of Jesus of Nazareth on the cross was an evil, unnecessary, violent, unjust act done by humans which should not be glorified, and cannot be justified.

In many feminist works, the cross is seen not so much as a symbol of salvation but rather as a symbol of the injustice that is so often meted out to the righteous. The cross is therefore not so much the ground of salvation as a protest against the injustice of the world. The cross may indeed be a tragedy; it is not, however, redemptive. Such approaches naturally lead into a discussion of how suffering can be transformed, rather than passively accepted.

Yet some feminist writers are disturbed that such a reading of the narrative of Jesus of Nazareth is linguistically and historically naïve. The Cambridge theologian Janet Martin Soskice (born 1951), for example, has expressed concern that some feminist approaches simply “ignore the symbolic complexity of religious language” and leave us with an unhistorical, decontextualized, and genderless person or principle who, or which, is somehow meant to be both inspirational and foundational for faith.

The difficulty with many feminist retellings of the story of Jesus is that they leave us with such thin fare. Anything sexist, violent, and hierarchical must go; so gone is talk of fathers, kings, lords, and blood. What we have left is a genderless Good Figure who (or which) runs the risk of losing all historical particularity.

It is too early to draw firm conclusions about these lines of argument, other than to note the important and often productive debates that they have occasioned. For example, the Mennonite writer Denny J. Weaver has developed an approach to atonement which makes use of feminist critiques of violence. In The Nonviolent Atonement (2001), Weaver sets out an approach to atonement – a “narrative Christus victor” – which locates the saving work of Jesus of Nazareth in his struggle against, and ultimate triumph over, the structural evil powers of this world. It is also clear that proponents of more traditional approaches to the atonement, aware of feminist critiques and perspectives, have re-examined the biblical foundations and some influential statements of these traditional positions to explore whether they can be reformulated in ways that meet these concerns.

Models of Salvation in Christ: Classical and Contemporary

As we noted earlier, the idea of “salvation” is exceptionally complex. One of the tasks of theology is to provide a critical analysis of the constituent elements of this idea. However, even this project is considerably more complex than it might seem. Different aspects of the Christian understanding of salvation have proved to have especial attraction for different periods of church history, or specific situations, reflecting the manner in which each aspect of this understanding interlocks with the specifics of the situation it addresses.

Recent studies of the theory of the Christian mission have laid considerable emphasis upon the importance of contextualization and the notion of the receptor orientation of the Christian proclamation. In other words, the Christian gospel is recognized to address specific situations and to contextualize the notion of salvation in those situations. To those who are oppressed, whether spiritually or politically, the gospel message is that of liberation. To those who are burdened by the weight of personal guilt, the “good news” is that of forgiveness and pardon.

The gospel is thus related to the specific situation of its audience – in other words, it is receptor oriented. If any of the following models of salvation were to be regarded as totally constitutive of the Christian understanding of salvation, a severely truncated and reduced gospel would result. However, it is widely agreed that a difference of emphasis within the range of understandings of the nature of salvation is acceptable.

In what follows, we shall explore a selection of components of this understanding and indicate the situations in which they have particular appeal and relevance. However, it must be appreciated that others – such as salvation as moral perfection or deliverance from the transience of this world – could easily be instanced.

We may begin our consideration of the way in which “salvation” is to be understood by exploring some of the central soteriological terms used in Paul's letters in the New Testament; these have had a significant impact on subsequent theological reflection.

Some Pauline Images of Salvation

The Pauline letters set out to explain some aspects of the Christian faith to their readers – often in controversial circumstances – and to encourage their application to the life of believers. It should therefore be no cause of surprise that Paul often deals with the issue of precisely what it is that has been achieved for believers through the death of Christ. Among the images that Paul uses in this respect, we may here consider four, as follows.

1. Adoption. At several points, Paul speaks of Christians as having been “adopted” into the family of God (Romans 8: 15, 23; Galatians 4: 5). It is widely thought that Paul is here drawing on a legal practice, common in Roman culture (yet, interestingly, not recognized within traditional Jewish law). According to many interpreters of Paul at this point – such as F. F. Bruce (1910–90) – to speak of “believers” having been adopted into the family of God is to make the point that believers share the same inheritance rights as Jesus Christ, and will hence receive the glory which Christ achieved (although only after first sharing in his sufferings).
2. Justification. Especially in those letters dealing with the relation of Christianity to Judaism (such as Galatians and Romans), Paul affirms that believers have been “justified through faith” (e.g., Romans 5: 1–2). This is widely held to entail a change in believers' legal status in the sight of God, and their ultimate assurance of acquittal before God, despite their sinfulness. The term “justification” and the verb “to justify” thus came to signify “entering into a right relationship with God,” or perhaps “being made righteous in the sight of God.” The Reformation witnessed an important debate over the meaning of the term “justification,” which we shall consider presently.

3. Redemption. This term primarily bears the sense of “to secure someone's release through payment.” In the ancient world which acted as the backdrop to Paul's thought, the term could be used to refer to the liberation of prisoners of war, or to the securing of the liberty of those who had sold themselves into slavery, often to pay off a family debt. Paul's basic idea appears to be that the death of Christ secures the freedom of believers from slavery to the law or to death, in order that they might become slaves of God instead (1 Corinthians 6: 20, 7: 23).
4. Salvation. It is important to appreciate that Paul uses a rich range of images to illuminate and clarify what benefits Christ secures for believers. One such term is “salvation.” For understandable reasons, this term has often been seen as of primary importance, overshadowing the others. In fact, the term has a series of specific associations, which need to be appreciated. The basic notion is that of deliverance from danger or captivity, including the idea of being delivered from some form of fatal illness. Notions such as “healing” and “liberation” can be seen as embraced by this important Pauline term. As pointed out earlier, Paul sees salvation as having past (e.g., Romans 8: 24), present (e.g., 1 Corinthians 1: 18), and future (e.g., Romans 13: 11) dimensions. This has important implications for the eschatological understanding of salvation.

Having examined some of Paul's language about salvation, we may now turn to consider how this has been explored and developed within the Christian theological tradition.

Deification: Being Made Divine

“God became human, in order that humans might become God” (Athanasius of Alexandria). This theological refrain may be discerned as underlying much of the soteriological reflection of the eastern Christian tradition, both during the patristic period and in the modern Greek and Russian Orthodox theological traditions.

The word “deification” is used to translate two different Greek words regularly used by writers such as Athanasius: theosis (“becoming divine”) and theopoiesis (“being made divine”). There is a distinction between the idea of deification as “becoming God” (theosis) and as “becoming like God” (homoiosis theoi). The first, associated with the Alexandrian school, conceives of deification as a union with the substance of God; the second, associated with the Antiochene school, interprets the believer's relationship with God more in terms of a participation in that which is divine, often conceived in terms of ethical perfection. The distinction between these approaches is subtle and reflects significantly different Christologies, which we noted earlier (pp. 220–3).

As the citation from Athanasius suggests, there is an especially strong link between the doctrine of the incarnation and this understanding of salvation. For Athanasius, salvation consists in human participation in the being of God. The divine Logos is imparted to humanity through the incarnation.

On the basis of the assumption of a universal human nature, Athanasius concluded that the Logos did not merely assume the specific human existence of Jesus Christ but that of human nature in general. As a consequence, all human beings are able to share in the deification which results from the incarnation. Human nature was created with the object of sharing in the being of God; through the descent of the Logos, this capacity is finally realized. Theosis is the means of salvation by which the believer is incorporated, not merely into the divine essence but also into the person of Christ, who, by virtue of the hypostatic union, is the mediator of divinity to humanity.

An emphasis upon “deification” is characteristic of eastern Christianity. Critics of the notion of “deification” have suggested that it represents a Greek philosophical notion that was improperly accommodated by eastern Christianity. Others, however, argue that the concept has deep biblical roots, and note how the notion is present in many western writers, including Augustine of Hippo, Martin Luther, John Calvin, and Jonathan Edwards (1703–58).

A modern Orthodox writer who places considerable emphasis on the notion of deification is the Russian writer Vladimir Lossky. In a 1953 essay on the theme of “redemption and deification,” Lossky sets out the distinctive Orthodox understanding of the relationship between the descent of God to humanity and the subsequent ascent of humanity to God:

The descent (katabasis) of the divine person of Christ makes human persons capable of an ascent (anabasis) in the Holy Spirit. It was necessary that the voluntary humiliation, the redemptive self-emptying (kenosis) of the Son of God should take place, so that fallen men might accomplish their vocation of theosis, the deification of created beings by uncreated grace. Thus the redeeming work of Christ – or rather, more generally speaking, the Incarnation of the Word – is seen as directly related to the ultimate goal of creatures: to know union with God. If this union has been accomplished in the divine person of the Son, who is God become man, it is necessary that each human person should in turn become god by grace, or become “a partaker in the divine nature,” according to St. Peter's expression (2 Peter 1: 4).

Righteousness in the Sight of God

“How do I find a gracious God?” Martin Luther's question has resonated down the centuries for those who shared his heartfelt conviction that sinners could not hope to find acceptance in the sight of a righteous God. For Luther, the question of salvation came to be linked with the issue of how guilt-ridden humans could ever possess a righteousness which would enable them to stand in God's presence. This concern is by no means outdated, as can be seen from the words of C. S. Lewis (1898–1963) in Mere Christianity (1952): “In my most clearsighted moments not only do I not think myself a nice man, but I know that I am a very nasty one. I can look at some of the things I have done with horror and loathing.” Such concerns naturally led to the use of legal or forensic categories in relation to the question of justification. For Luther, the gospel offered a justifying righteousness to believers – a righteousness which would shield them from condemnation and permit them to enter into the presence of God (see pp. 338–9).

Such insights were developed within later Protestant orthodoxy and achieved a wide circulation in popular Protestant devotional writings and hymns. In a period in which the threat of divine punishment was taken with considerable seriousness (witness Jonathan Edwards's passionate sermons on this theme), the idea of deliverance from condemnation on account of sin was regarded as of central importance to the gospel. One of the hymns to express this concern for righteousness in the sight of God with particular force is “And Can it Be?,” by Charles Wesley (1707–88). The last verse includes the following lines:

No condemnation now I dread;
Jesus, and all in him, is mine!
Alive in him, my living head!
And clothed in righteousness divine.

Personal Holiness

One of the most important movements in western Christianity has placed considerable emphasis on the cross as the basis of personal holiness. The Wesleyan or Holiness traditions, which include the Church of the Nazarene, stress the importance of the personal demonstration of holiness. The holiness of the believer is grounded in the work of Christ and effected through the work of the Holy Spirit. The origins of this approach are to be traced back to John Wesley (1703–91). While Wesley asserted the primacy of justification, and the assurance the believer could have based upon the righteousness of Christ, he insisted upon the need for development in holiness.

Wesley's notion of perfection was not that of sinlessness but of an ever-deepening process of comprehensive moral change. In developing this point, Wesley drew upon the works of those whom he termed the “mystic writers” (a category including Anglicans such as William Law, 1686–1761; Catholics such as Francis de Sales, 1567–1622, Madame Guyon, 1648–1717, and François Fenélon, 1651–1715; and the Lutheran Pietist Augustus H. Francke, 1663–1727). From them, Wesley learned that the heart of true godliness is a motivating spirit of love to God and humanity, without which religion is hollow and empty.

These ideas were developed further within American Methodism. Francis Asbury (1745–1816) held that believers should be encouraged to expect “entire sanctification” at some point in their lives. The growing emphasis on revivalism within nineteenth-century American Protestantism emphasized the importance of definable turning points in a Christian's life. This form of “holiness preaching” tended to center around Wesley's teaching of “entire sanctification” as a second crisis experience, subsequent to, and dependent upon, justification. In part, this emphasis on the need for holiness represents a response to the moral devastation of the American nation resulting from the Civil War. In 1870, Methodist bishops in the southern states began to re-emphasize sanctification, arguing that “nothing is so much needed at the present time throughout all these lands, as a general and powerful revival of scriptural holiness.”

A key figure in the later development of this holiness teaching was Phoebe Worrall Palmer (1807–74), undoubtedly the most influential Methodist woman of her generation. Palmer developed Wesley's doctrine of entire sanctification, modifying it in some significant ways. Like Wesley, she taught that entire sanctification is a second distinct work of grace in which God cleanses the believer's heart of sin and fills it wholly with divine love. Such holiness of the heart is a requirement for entry into heaven. Because God commands this holiness, Palmer argues, God must also supply the ability to attain it, and God gives that ability in response to the Christian's faith.

Where Wesley had seen holiness as a gift, Palmer now tended to see it as an obligation. The focus of sanctification tended to be wholly upon a single point of wholehearted commitment, and divorced from any gradual process. And, where Wesley had tended to conceive holiness as something that is gradually attained, Palmer tended to emphasize its instantaneous elements. This point is significant, as it indicates links between Palmer's holiness teaching and that later associated with Pentecostalism. In this context, it is important to note Palmer's identification of entire sanctification with the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the related link that she identified between holiness and power.

Authentic Human Existence

The rise of existentialism brought with it a new concern for authentic human existence (pp. 155, 231). Existentialism, protesting against the dehumanizing tendency to treat humans as objects devoid of any subjective existence, demanded that attention be paid to the inner lives of individuals. The distinction drawn by Martin Heidegger (1889–1976) between “authentic existence” and “inauthentic existence” represented an important statement of the bipolar structure of human existence. Two options were open. Rudolf Bultmann, developing such an approach, argued that the New Testament spoke of two possible modes of human existence: an authentic or redeemed existence, characterized by faith in God, and an inauthentic existence, characterized by being fettered to the transient material order. For Bultmann, Christ made possible and available, through the kerygma, authentic existence (see pp. 239, 433–4).

Bultmann does not entirely reduce salvation to the notion of “authentic existence,” as if Christianity related solely to the experiential world of individuals. However, the emphasis which he placed upon this notion tended to create the impression that this was the sum total of the “salvation” offered through the gospel.

A related approach was developed by Paul Tillich, using a slightly different set of terms. Within the context of Tillich's system, “salvation” does indeed seem to be reduced to little more than a general human philosophy of existence, offering insights to those who are aware of tensions within their personal existence. This outlook has been criticized by many concerned with the transcendent elements of salvation, as well as those wishing to draw attention to the political and social aspects of the Christian gospel, such as liberation theology.

Political Liberation

Latin American liberation theology places considerable emphasis upon the idea of salvation as liberation (see pp. 74–5). The title of Leonardo Boff's (born 1938) Jesus Christ Liberator (1972) makes this point forcefully. Salvation is here contextualized in the political world of Latin America, including its radical and pervasive poverty and the struggle for social and political justice. God is seen to side with the exploited peoples of the world, as in the deliverance of Israel from captivity and oppression under Pharaoh. Similarly, Jesus appears to have expressed and exercised a preferential option for the poor in his teaching and ministry. Jesus Christ brings liberation, through both his teaching and his lifestyle.

Theologically, this is expressed in terms of stressing the social dimensions of sin. Oscar Romero (1917–80) defined social sin as “the crystallization of individual egoisms in permanent structures which maintain this sin and exert its power over the great majorities.” Sin is thus not seen primarily in individual terms, as in some western approaches to salvation. Rather, it is seen in terms of sinful and oppressive social structures, which are to be challenged and combated. Leonardo Boff thus locates the significance of the death of Christ as disclosing the reality of structural sin, and offering inspiration to those who wish to oppose it. Jesus of Nazareth “historicizes in exemplary fashion the suffering experienced by God in all the crosses of the oppressed.”

Liberation theology has been criticized for viewing both the figure of Jesus and the concept of salvation in the light of a predetermined interpretive grid derived from the Latin American context. However, all Christologies and soteriologies are vulnerable to this charge. For example, the writers of the Enlightenment interpreted both the person and the work of Jesus Christ in terms of a predetermined framework, derived in part from the middle-class European context in which most of them existed and in part from the severely rationalist outlook characteristic of the movement. Equally, it can be argued that the Greek patristic writers tended to view Christ through a Hellenistic prism, which had significant consequences for their Christologies and soteriologies. However, the criticism just noted has validity, if the understanding of either the person or the work of Christ is reduced to a purely political or social conception of liberation.

Spiritual Freedom

The Christus victor approach to the death and resurrection of Christ lays considerable emphasis upon the notion of Christ's victory over forces which enslave humanity – such as satanic oppression, evil spirits, fear of death, and the power of sin. The early patristic writers had little difficulty in regarding these forces as real oppressive and hostile presences in the everyday world. In consequence, the proclamation of liberty from their oppression through the cross and resurrection of Christ came to be of central importance, as can be seen from the Easter homilies of writers such as John Chrysostom (c.347–407). Similar ideas can be shown to be prominent in the popular devotional and spiritual writings of the Middle Ages. Martin Luther continued this tradition, placing considerable emphasis upon the objective power of Satan in the world and the liberation resulting from the gospel.

With the rise of the Enlightenment worldview, belief in objective evil spirits or a personal devil became increasingly problematic. Writers sympathetic to the Enlightenment generally dismissed such beliefs as outmoded superstitions which had no place in the modern world. If the idea of “salvation as victory” was to remain current, it would have to be reinterpreted. Such a process can be seen taking place in the writings of Paul Tillich, where salvation is understood in terms of a victory over subjective forces which enslave humanity and trap it in inauthentic modes of existence. What the patristic writers treated as objective forces were thus treated as subjective or existential.

The Appropriation of Salvation in Christ

The Christian hope of salvation rests upon the death and resurrection of Christ. So how is that salvation mediated and appropriated? In what follows, we shall consider several models of the appropriation of salvation. Some emphasize the role of the church, others the personal commitment of the believer.

The Church as the Means of Salvation

In the third century, Cyprian of Carthage (died 258) penned a slogan which would have a decisive impact on Christian understandings of the role of the church as the mediator and guarantor of redemption: extra ecclesiam nulla salus (Latin; “outside the church, there is no salvation”). This pithy maxim was open to a number of interpretations. That which predominated throughout the Middle Ages can be argued to have resulted directly from the growth in institutional authority of the church after the collapse of the Roman empire. Salvation required membership of the church. Christ may have made the hope of heaven possible; only the church could make it available.

The insight that the institution of the church was the guarantor of the hope of heaven was rapidly assimilated into church architecture. The great portals of Romanesque churches were often adorned with elaborate sculptures depicting the glory of heaven as tactile affirmations that it was only by entering the church that this reality could be experienced. Inscriptions were often placed over the great west door of churches, declaring that it was only through entering the church that heaven could be attained. The portal was allowed to be identified with Christ for this purpose, speaking words directed to those passing by or pausing to admire its magnificent ornamentation. An excellent example is provided by the Benedictine priory church of St.-Marcel-lès-Sauzet in southern France, which was founded in 985 and extensively developed during the twelfth century. The portal to the church depicts Christ addressing these words to all who draw near:

You who are passing through, you who are coming to weep for your sins,

Pass through me, since I am the gate of life.

Although the words are clearly to be attributed to Christ (picking up on the image of Christ as the “gate of the sheepfold” from John 10), a tactile link has been forged with the building of the church itself. This was often reinforced visually through the physical location of the baptismal font close to the door of the church, thereby affirming that entrance to heaven is linked with the sacrament of baptism.

On the other hand, some regard salvation as a purely individual matter which has no necessary connection with the institution of the church. Some Pietist writers held that it was an individual's free decision to repent and admit Christ into their soul and thus secure the hope of heaven. The institution of the church plays no critical role in this process whatsoever, however valuable it may subsequently be as a means of pastoral support and spiritual nourishment. The door through which people enter heaven is thus understood to be, not the institution of the church and its attending sacramental system, but personal conversion – a deliberate decision on the part of individuals to throw open the doors of their lives and admit Christ as a living presence within them, a presence which may be experienced and felt.

Most Christian theologians would agree that the church is involved in some manner in mediating salvation. “All salvation comes from Christ the Head through the Church which is his Body” (Catechism of the Catholic Church). Some argue that commitment to the church secures salvation; others recognized that individual believers had to make some kind of response if they were to benefit from the death and resurrection of Christ; others accepted both these points. Martin Luther, for example, spoke of faith as a hand which embraced Christ; the Catechism of the Catholic Church declares that “God's free initiative demands man's free response, for God has created man in his image by conferring on him, along with freedom, the power to know him and love him.” Yet it is perfectly possible to hold these corporate and individual accounts together, seeing the church as mediating the means of salvation for those wishing to appropriate it individually.

Three main models have been used, particularly within Protestant theology, to help grasp the way in which believers, either individually or corporately, connect with and benefit from the “benefits of Christ.”

Christ as a Representative

This model understands Christ as the covenant representative of humanity. Through faith, believers come to stand within the covenant between God and humanity. All that Christ has achieved through the cross is available on account of the covenant. Just as God entered into a covenant with his people Israel, so he has entered into a covenant with his church. Christ, by his obedience upon the cross, represents his covenant people, winning benefits for them as their representative. By coming to faith, individuals come to stand within the covenant and thus share in all its benefits, won by Christ through his cross and resurrection – including the full and free forgiveness of our sins.

This idea is particularly associated with the Reformed theology of the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, which developed a sophisticated covenant theology. Adam was humanity's representative under the old covenant of works; Christ has become our representative under the new covenant of grace. These covenant theologies are seen in their most fully developed form in New England Puritanism during the eighteenth century.

Participation in Christ

A second approach stresses that, through faith, believers participate in the risen Christ. They are “in Christ,” to use Paul's famous phrase. They are caught up in him and share in his risen life. As a result of this, they share in all the benefits won by Christ, through his obedience upon the cross. One of those benefits is the forgiveness of sins, in which they share through faith. New Testament scholar E. P.

Sanders (born 1937) states the importance of “participation in Christ” for Paul in the following words:

The prime significance which the death of Christ has for Paul is not that it provides atonement for past transgressions (although he holds the common Christian view that it does so), but that, by sharing in Christ's death, one dies to the power of sin or to the old aeon, with the result that one belongs to God. [...] The transfer takes place by participation in Christ's death.

Participating in Christ thus entails the forgiveness of sins and sharing in his righteousness. This idea is central to Luther's soteriology, as his image of the marriage between Christ and the believer makes clear. In some way, faith unites us with Christ and thus enables us to participate in his attributes.

Christ as a Substitute

Christ is here understood to be a substitute, the one who goes to the cross in our place. Sinners ought to have been crucified, on account of their sins. Christ is crucified in their place. God allows Christ to stand in our place, taking our guilt upon himself, so that his righteousness – won by obedience upon the cross – might become ours. This idea is not found to any significant extent in the theological writings of the patristic and medieval periods. It becomes significant in the sixteenth century, particularly in the writings of John Calvin, and continues to be developed by conservative Protestant theologians, such as James I. Packer.

The Scope of Salvation in Christ

The Christian tradition has witnessed intense debate over the extent of the salvation which is made available and possible through Christ. Two central affirmations, both of which are deeply grounded in the New Testament, may be discerned as exercising a controlling influence over this discussion:

- God wishes all people to be saved.
- Salvation is possible only in and through Christ.

The various approaches to the question of the scope of salvation rest upon different manners of resolving the dialectic between these assumptions. An important parallel should be noted here between the discussion of the scope of salvation and the relationship between Christianity and other religions, to be discussed at greater length in Chapter 17.

Universalism: All will be Saved

The view that all people will be saved, irrespective of whether they have heard or responded to the Christian proclamation of redemption in Christ, has exerted a strong influence within the Christian tradition. It represents a powerful affirmation of the universal saving will of God and its ultimate actualization in the universal redemption of all people. Its most significant early exponent was Origen, who defended the idea at length in his First Principles. Origen was deeply suspicious of any form of dualism – that is, any belief system which acknowledged the existence of two supreme powers, one good and one evil. This belief was characteristic of many forms of Gnosticism and was very influential in the eastern Mediterranean world in the late second century.

Arguing that dualism was fatally flawed, Origen pointed out that this had important implications for the Christian doctrine of salvation. To reject dualism is to reject the idea that God and Satan rule over their respective kingdoms for eternity. In the end, God will overcome evil and restore creation to its original form. In its original form, creation was subject to the will of God. It therefore follows, on the basis of this “restorationist” soteriology, that the final redeemed version of creation cannot include anything along the lines of “a hell” or “a kingdom of Satan.” All “will be restored to their condition of happiness [...] in order that the human race [...] may be restored to that unity promised by the Lord Jesus Christ.”

Related ideas have been developed in the twentieth century, most notably by Karl Barth. We shall explore his approach elsewhere in the context of his doctrine of predestination, to allow the relationship between his doctrines of salvation and grace to be appreciated more fully (pp. 348–9). A different approach may be found in the writings of John A. T. Robinson (1919–83), a radical English theologian active in the 1960s, especially in his In the End God (1968). In this book, Robinson considers the nature of the love of God. “May we not imagine a love so strong that ultimately no one will be able to restrain himself from free and grateful surrender?” This notion of omnipotent love functions as the central idea of Robinson's universalism. In the end, love will conquer all, making the existence of hell an impossibility. “In a universe of love there can be no heaven which tolerates a chamber of horrors.”

Only Believers will be Saved

The position to be discussed in this section is one of the most influential positions in relation to the scope of salvation. Its most vigorous defender in the early church was Augustine, who consciously distanced himself from the universalism associated with Origen by stressing the need for faith as a precondition for salvation. In doing so, Augustine cited a large number of New Testament passages which emphasize the conditionality of salvation or eternal life upon faith. A classic example of such a text is John 6: 51, in which Christ refers to himself as a bread which, if eaten, will bring eternal life. “I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, they will live for ever. This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.”

This position was maintained by most writers of the Middle Ages. Thomas Aquinas argued that an act of faith was a necessary condition of salvation. This view is echoed in many popular devotional writings of the period, including the highly sophisticated Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri (1265–1321).

One of the most vigorous defenders of this position at the time of the Reformation was John Calvin, who dismissed the views of his fellow reformer Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) to the effect that pious pagans could attain salvation. “All the more vile is the stupidity of those people who open heaven to all the impious and unbelieving, without the grace of him whom Scripture teaches to be the only door by which we enter into salvation.”

So what do such writers make of the biblical assertions that God wishes all to be saved, and all to come to a knowledge of the truth? Augustine and Calvin argue that such texts are to be interpreted sociologically: God wishes all kinds of people – but not all people – to be saved. Redemption embraces all nationalities, cultures, languages, geographical regions, and walks of life. This is the soteriological equivalent of the doctrine of the catholicity of the church, to be considered later (pp. 377–8).

However, a number of modified versions of this approach should be noted. For example, is it necessary to have a fully Christian faith in God in order to be saved? This question is of major importance in relation to an understanding of mission and evangelism, and also regarding the relation of Christianity to other religions. In his sermon “On Faith,” John Wesley argued for the need for faith in God in order to be saved – but affirmed that this faith need not be explicitly Christian in character. The requirement for salvation is “such a divine conviction of God, and the things of God, as, even in its infant state, enables every one that possesses it to fear God and work righteousness. And whosoever, in every nation, believes thus far, the Apostle declares is accepted.” What, then, is the advantage of a specifically Christian belief, as opposed to this more general theistic belief? According to Wesley, two differences may be noted. First, such theists have yet to attain the full benefits of the redeemed life. They are “servants of God” but not “sons of God.” Second, they do not have full assurance of salvation, which is only possible on the basis of Christ.

A similar position is associated with the twentieth-century literary critic and apologist C. S. Lewis. In his Mere Christianity, Lewis argued that those who commit themselves to the pursuit of goodness and truth will be saved, even if they have no formal knowledge of Christ. Although Lewis has philosophers in mind, he extends his approach to include other religions. “There are people in other religions who are being led by God's secret influence to concentrate on those parts of their religion which are in agreement with Christianity, and who thus belong to Christ without knowing it.” There are clear parallels here with the writings of the Jesuit theologian Karl Rahner (1904–84), to be discussed later (pp. 420–2).

Particular Redemption: Only the Elect will be Saved

A final approach which should be noted is variously termed “definite redemption,” “particular redemption,” “effective atonement,” and “limited atonement.” This has Reformed associations, and is particularly influential in such circles in the United States. The basis of the approach lies in the Reformed doctrine of predestination, to be discussed in Chapter 12. However, its historical origins can be discerned in the ninth century, in the writings of Godescalc of Orbais (also known as Gottschalk, c.808–67). Godescalc argued along the following lines:

1. Let us suppose that Christ died for all people.
2. But not all people will be saved. Therefore, it follows that Christ died to no effect for those who are not saved. This raises the gravest of questions concerning the efficacy of his death.
3. But, if Christ died only for those who are to be saved, he will have succeeded in his mission in every case.
4. Therefore Christ died only for those who are to be saved.

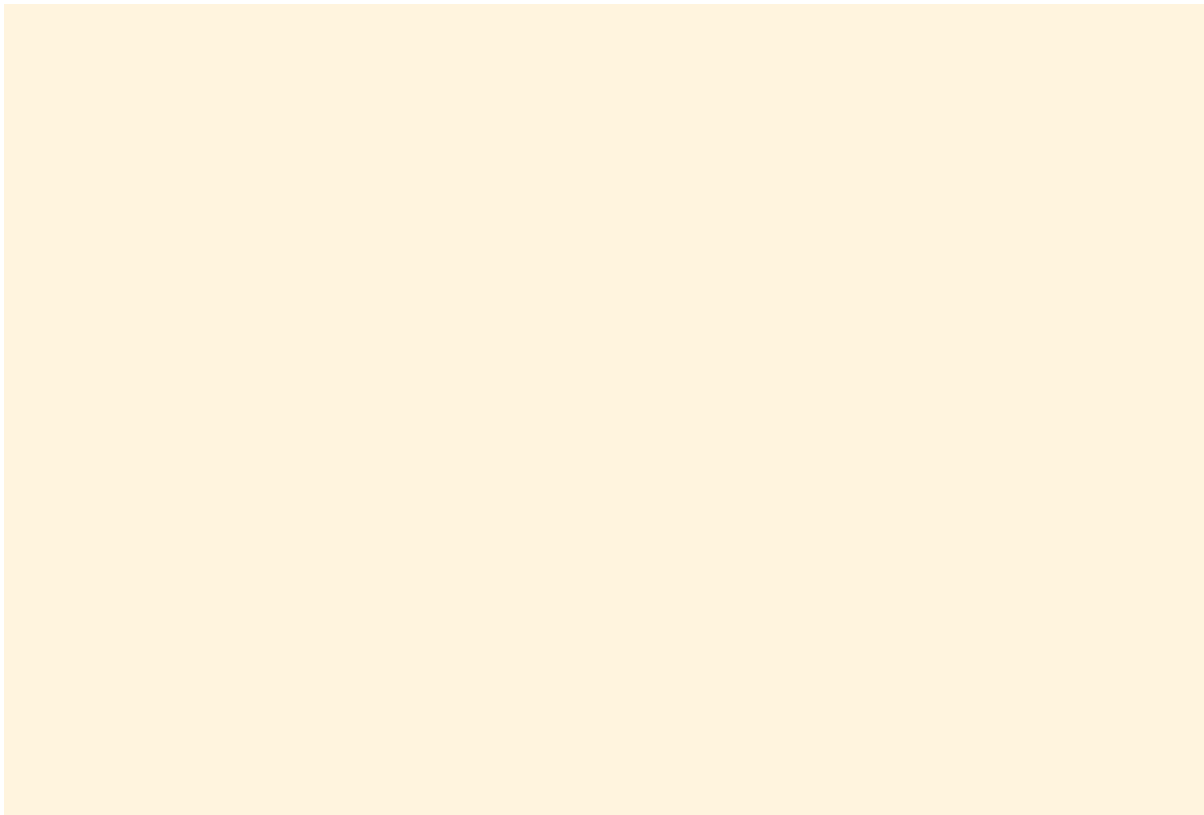

Related lines of argument can be discerned in the later sixteenth century, and especially during the seventeenth century. The doctrine which emerged at this time, especially within Puritan circles, can be summarized as follows:

1. Christ died only for the elect. Although his death is sufficient to achieve the redemption of all people, it is effective only for the elect.
2. As a result, Christ's work was not in vain. All those for whom he died are saved.

Although this approach clearly possesses a certain logical coherence, its critics tend to regard it as compromising the New Testament's affirmation of the universality of God's love and redemption.

The present chapter has explored central aspects of the Christian doctrine of salvation, demonstrating both the richness and the variety of Christian thinking on the subject. It is clear that there is a close connection between the doctrine of salvation and that of grace, especially in relation to predestination. For this reason, we shall now move on to consider these, and related, matters in more detail.

Questions for Chapter 11

1. How are Christian understandings of the person of Christ related to understandings of the work of Christ?
2. Assess the importance of one of the following approaches to the meaning of the cross: a victory over sin and death; forgiveness of sin; a demonstration of the love of God toward humanity.
3. From what are we saved?
4. Is a human response to salvation necessary?
5. How are the cross and resurrection related in Christian understandings of salvation?
6. Do you think the cross of Christ legitimizes the use of violence in religious contexts?

THE HOLY SPIRIT

The Holy Spirit has long been the Cinderella of the Trinity. The other two sisters may have gone to the theological ball; the Holy Spirit got left behind every time. But not now. The rise of the charismatic movement within virtually every mainstream church during the twentieth century has ensured that the Holy Spirit figures prominently on the theological agenda. A new experience of the reality and power of the Spirit has had a major impact upon the theological discussion of the person and work of the Holy Spirit in recent decades. In this chapter, we shall consider the historical development and significance of the theology of the Holy Spirit, an area of theology occasionally referred to as “pneumatology” (from the Greek: pneuma, “spirit”).

The Biblical Witness

Theological reflection on the role of the Holy Spirit is rooted in both the Old and the New Testaments, which use terms such as “spirit” or “holy spirit” to designate the presence and activity of God in the world and in human experience. The English language uses at least three words – “wind,” “breath,” and “spirit” – to translate a single Hebrew term, ruach. This important Hebrew word has a depth of meaning which it is virtually impossible to reproduce in English. Ruach, traditionally translated simply as “spirit,” is associated with a range of meanings, each of which casts some light on the complex associations of the Christian notion of the Holy Spirit:

1. Spirit as wind. The image of “wind” suggests power, movement, and uncontrollability, all of which correspond to aspects of the biblical idea of God. Old Testament writers are careful not to identify God with the wind and thus reduce God to the level of a natural force. Nevertheless, a parallel is drawn between the power of the wind and that of God. To speak of God as spirit is to call to mind the surging energy of the “Lord of Hosts” and to remind Israel of the power and dynamism of the God who led Israel out of Egypt through a powerful wind which divides the Red Sea (Exodus 14: 21). Here, the idea of ruach conveys both the power and the redemptive purpose of God.

2. Spirit as breath. The idea of spirit is associated with life. When God created Adam, God breathed into him the breath of life, as a result of which he became a living being (Genesis 2: 7). The famous vision of the valley of the dry bones (Ezekiel 37: 1–14) also illustrates this point: the bones only come to life when breath enters into them (Ezekiel 37: 9–10). The model of God as spirit thus conveys the fundamental insight that God is the one who gives life. Ruach is often linked with God's work of creation (e.g., Genesis 1: 2; Job 26: 12–13, 33: 4; Psalm 104: 27–31).
3. Spirit as charism. The technical term “charism” refers to the “filling of an individual with the Spirit of God,” by which the person in question is enabled to perform tasks which would otherwise be impossible. The gift of wisdom is often portrayed as a consequence of the endowment of the Spirit (Genesis 41: 38–9; Exodus 28: 3, 35: 31; Deuteronomy 34: 9). Similarly, the calling of a prophet also rests upon an endowment with the Spirit (Isaiah 61: 1; Ezekiel 2: 1–2; Micah 3: 8; Zechariah 7: 12), which authenticates the prophet's message – a message which is usually described as “the word [dabhar] of the Lord.”

The New Testament retained these basic elements of the Old Testament's understanding of the person and work of the Holy Spirit, emphasizing that the Spirit dwells within believers. The Holy Spirit gives rise to faith (1 Corinthians 12: 3), pours love into human hearts (Romans 5: 5), and guides the prayers of Christians (Romans 8: 26). It is also seen as a “pledge” or “guarantee” of the believer's salvation – an initial phase in the transformation of human nature, which is completed in heaven.

The Patristic Period

The early church found itself puzzled by the Spirit and struggled to make theological sense of this aspect of the Christian understanding of God. Was the Spirit itself divine? Or was it some kind of divine agent or surrogate? Or an abstract force emanating from God? Early Christian writers speak of the Holy Spirit – for example, in Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165)'s statement “we bless the Maker of all things through His Son Jesus Christ and through the Holy Spirit.” Yet, while it is clear that Justin recognizes the active presence of a Holy Spirit distinct from the Father who creates the world, and the Son who appeared on earth as savior, he does not assign a distinctive function or role to the Spirit in the economy of salvation. This almost certainly reflects Justin's primary concern to develop the idea of Jesus Christ as the logos of God, which meant his focus was on the person and work of Christ, rather than of the Spirit.

Some scholars have suggested that early Christianity was binitarian (rather than Trinitarian), in that its focus of discussion appears to have been on God and Jesus Christ, rather than the Holy Spirit. There is some truth in this observation, in that early debates and discussions focused on the relationship between Father and Son. We have already noted the importance of patristic Christological debates, especially in the fourth century, in helping to clarify some core themes of the Christian faith. Yet even the earliest Christian writers use a threefold creedal formula to refer to God, specifically identifying the basics of Christian faith as involving Father, Son, and Spirit. It was not until the fourth century that the Spirit came to be the center of theological discussion.

The second-century writer Montanus, who is known to have been active during the period 135–75, is a relatively rare example of a theologian operating in the early period of the church who focused on the activity of the Spirit. The leading ideas of Montanus are known chiefly through the writings of his critics, with the result that our understanding of Montanism may be somewhat distorted. However, it is clear that Montanus placed considerable emphasis on the activity of the Holy Spirit in the present, and particularly on the role of the Spirit in relation to dreams, visions, and prophetic revelations. It is even possible that Montanus may have identified himself with the Holy Spirit, seeing himself as the source of a divine revelation which was not otherwise available. However, the evidence for this assertion is ambiguous, and recent scholarship has tended to emphasize the orthodoxy of the early Montanism movement, especially in Phrygia.

In this section, we shall look at how the patristic age explored this area of theology, often somewhat tentatively.

Early Patristic Reflections: Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202)

The most important pressure which emerged in early Christian thinking about the Holy Spirit was to find a distinct theological place for the Spirit, rather than to think of the Spirit simply as another (or different kind of) Son. Irenaeus of Lyons, writing in the second century, was a witness to an important process of clarification which took place during the early church concerning the person and work of the Holy Spirit. The development of the distinctive vocabulary of Trinitarian theology dated from a century later; Irenaeus does not use these technical terms, which were simply not available to him.

Irenaeus's theology is best seen as an elaboration of the basic “rule of faith” which was being widely adopted around this time. In his Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, Irenaeus insisted upon the distinct yet related roles of Father, Son, and Spirit within the economy of salvation. He affirmed his faith in “God the Father, uncreated,” in “the Word of God, the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ,” and the “Holy Spirit.” In commenting on each of these three persons, Irenaeus offers a succinct account of the role of the Spirit: “in the fullness of time, [the Holy Spirit] was poured out in a new way on our human nature in order to renew humanity throughout the entire world in the sight of God.”

This brief statement echoes a widespread consensus within the second-century church, which saw the Spirit primarily as God's means of renewing and restoring human nature, and as the inspiration of prophecy – an important role within the early church. Irenaeus clearly believed that the idea of a personal entity called “the Spirit” alongside God the Father and Jesus Christ as the Son and Word of God was an integral aspect of the faith handed down to the church from the apostles. Yet Irenaeus developed these ideas in new directions. Two developments which are generally attributed to him are the motif of the Word and Spirit as the “two hands of God” in creation, and the tendency to speak of the Spirit in terms of “wisdom” (Latin: sapientia). We shall consider each of these points briefly.

For Irenaeus, God brings the created order into being through Jesus Christ. Yet Irenaeus is clear that the Holy Spirit has a role in this process. Irenaeus speaks of the Wisdom and Word of God as the “hands” of God. “For the Word and Wisdom, the Son and the Spirit, were always present with [God], by whom and in whom, all things were made.” There is one God, who created and arranged all things by the Word and Wisdom. Human beings were “created in the likeness of God by the hands of the Father, that is, by the Son and the Holy Spirit.”

The second theme associated with Irenaeus is speaking of the Spirit as God's “Wisdom,” implying that the Spirit as Wisdom is present alongside the “Word” in God from the beginning. It also identifies a distinct role for the Holy Spirit in the economy of salvation, namely that of binding the creation together or bringing it to its intended goal. Most earlier Christian writers refer to the Logos as an agent of creation, but hardly any (Theophilus of Antioch, died c.183–5, is a rare exception) include the Spirit as a creator along with the Logos. Similarly, most early patristic writers followed Paul in regarding Jesus Christ as the “wisdom of God” (see 1 Corinthians 1: 24). Yet Theophilus and Irenaeus identified this pre-existent wisdom with the Holy Spirit, thus distinguishing the Holy Spirit from the Logos.

This distinction of the persons and roles of the Word and Wisdom is made particularly clear in this important passage: “We should know that the only true God is the one who made and formed and breathed in them the breath of life, and nourishes us by creation, establishing all things by his Word, and binding them together by his Wisdom.” Irenaeus here speaks of the work of the Word and Spirit in quite distinct manners. The Word “establishes” (confirmare) all things, while the Spirit “binds them all together” (compingere).

Athanasius (c.293–373): The Debate Over the Divinity of the Holy Spirit

The relative absence of extensive discussion of the role of the Holy Spirit in the first three centuries reflects the fact that theological debate centered elsewhere. The Greek patristic writers had, in their view, more important things to do than worry about the Spirit, when vital political and Christological debates were raging all around them. This point was made by the fourth-century writer Amphilochius of Iconium (died c.400), who pointed out that the Arian controversy (see pp. 217–20) had first to be resolved before any serious discussion over the status of the Holy Spirit could get under way. The theological development of the early church was generally a response to public debates; once a serious debate got under way, doctrinal clarification was the inevitable outcome.

The debate in question initially centered upon a group of writers known as the Pneumatomachoi or “opponents of the spirit,” led by Eustathius of Sebaste (c.300–77 or 380). These writers argued that neither the person nor the works of the Spirit were to be regarded as having the status or nature of a divine person. Many Christians had no difficulty in accepting the full divinity of the Son, but found themselves unable to extend that confession to the Holy Spirit. So what were their concerns? One of the most fundamental concerns was that the Bible simply did not speak explicitly of the Holy Spirit in terms that implied its divinity.

A group known as the Tropici appealed to texts such as Amos 4: 13 and 1 Timothy 5: 21 in defense of their belief that the Holy Spirit was a creature, rather than being divine. Amos 4: 13 could be understood to speak of God “creating” the Spirit (Hebrew: ruach). Yet their critics suggested that the context implied that the reference was to “the wind,” not to the Spirit. Similarly, 1 Timothy 5: 21 could be interpreted to mean that the Spirit was really an angel. More significantly, the Tropici argued that, if the Spirit was not a creature, the Spirit must also be a Son. After all, if the Spirit was understood to come from the Father, and be one with the Father, this amounted to identifying the Spirit of God with the Son of God.

In response to such concerns, writers such as Athanasius and Basil of Caesarea (c.330–79) made an appeal to the formula which had by then become universally accepted for baptism. Since the time of the New Testament (see Matthew 28: 18–20), Christians had been baptized in the name of “the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.” Athanasius argued that this had momentous implications for an understanding of the status of the person of the Holy Spirit. In a letter to his friend Bishop Serapion of Thmuis, Athanasius declared that the baptismal formula clearly pointed to the Spirit sharing the same divinity as the Father and the Son.

In combating the Tropici, Athanasius had two main tasks. First, he had to provide a solid theological foundation to defend the divinity of the Spirit. Second, he had to show that there was a distinct theological space for the Spirit alongside the Son, so that the Spirit was not merged with the Son. The Spirit had to be shown to have a distinct relationship with the Father, rather than duplicating that of the Son. Athanasius provided answers to both these problems.

First, Athanasius argued that the work of the Spirit pointed inescapably to the divine nature of the Spirit. How could the Spirit deify humanity if the Spirit itself was a creature? After all, Paul refers to the church as the “temple of God” within which the Spirit dwells. “If the Holy Spirit were a creature, we should have no participation in God. If indeed we were joined to a creature, we should be strangers to the divine nature in that we do not share it.” This argument eventually prevailed. The Spirit can only sanctify humanity if the Spirit is divine. A creature cannot make anyone holy; only God can do this.

Second, Athanasius developed a framework within which the Spirit and Son could both be affirmed to be divine, but with different patterns of relationship to the Father. The Son and Spirit share in the work of the Father but have distinct identities. In his Letters to Serapion, Athanasius develops some images to help clarify this. The Father is the fountain, the Son is the river that flows from the fountain, and the Spirit is the water of the river. Or again, the Father is light, the Son is the radiance emanating from this light, and the Spirit is the one “by whom we are enlightened.” Whenever someone receives the Spirit, they receive the Son and Father as well.

The Council of Constantinople (381)

As we noted above, many patristic writers were hesitant to speak openly of the Spirit as “God” as this practice was not sanctioned by Scripture – a point discussed at some length by Basil of Caesarea in his treatise on the Holy Spirit (374–5). Even as late as 380, Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89) conceded that many Orthodox Christian theologians were uncertain as to whether to treat the Holy Spirit “as an activity, as a creator, or as God.”

This caution can be seen in the final statement of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit formulated by the Council of Constantinople in 381. The Spirit was here described, not explicitly as “God,” but slightly more indirectly as “the Lord and giver of life, who proceeds from the Father, and is worshiped and glorified with the Father and Son.” The Spirit is to be treated as having the same dignity and rank as the Father and Son, even if the term “God” is not to be used explicitly. The precise relation of the Spirit to Father and Son would subsequently become an item of debate in its own right, as the filioque controversy indicates (see pp. 287–9).

The following considerations seem to have been of decisive importance in establishing the divinity of the Holy Spirit during the later fourth century. First, as Gregory of Nazianzus stressed, Scripture applied all the titles of God to the Spirit, with the exception of “unbegotten.” Gregory drew particular attention to the use of the word “holy” to refer to the Spirit, arguing that this holiness did not result from any external source but was the direct consequence of the nature of the Spirit. The Spirit was to be considered as the one who sanctifies, rather than the one who requires to be sanctified.

Second, the functions which are specific to the Holy Spirit establish the divinity of the Spirit. Didymus the Blind (c.313–98) was one of many writers to point out that the Spirit was responsible for the creation, renewal, and sanctification of God's creatures. Yet how could one creature renew or sanctify another creature? Only if the Spirit was divine could sense be made of these functions. If the Holy Spirit performed functions which were specific to God, it must follow that the Holy Spirit shares in the divine nature. This point is stated with particular clarity by Basil of Caesarea:

All who are in need of sanctification turn to the Spirit; all those seek him who live by virtue, for his breath refreshes them and comes to their aid in the pursuit of their natural and proper end. Capable of perfecting others, the Spirit himself lacks nothing. He is not a being who needs to restore his strength, but himself supplies life. [...] Souls in which the Spirit dwells, illuminated by the Spirit, themselves become spiritual and send forth their grace to others. From here comes foreknowledge of the future, understanding of mysteries, apprehension of what is hidden, the sharing of the gifts of grace, heavenly citizenship, a place in the chorus of angels, joy without end, abiding in God, being made like God and – the greatest of them all – being made God.

For Basil, the Spirit makes creatures both to be like God and to be God – and only one who is divine can bring this about.

Third, the reference to the Spirit in the baptismal formula of the church was interpreted as supporting the divinity of the Spirit. Baptism took place in the name of the “Father, Son, and Holy Spirit” (Matthew 28: 18–20). Athanasius and others argued that this formula established the closest of connections between the three members of the Trinity, making it impossible to suggest that the Father and Son shared in the substance of the Godhead, while the Spirit was nothing other than a creature. In a similar way, Basil of Caesarea argued that the baptismal formula clearly implied the inseparability of Father, Son, and Spirit. This verbal association, according to Basil, clearly had considerable theological implications.

The recognition of the full divinity of the Spirit thus took place at a relatively late stage in the development of patristic theology. In terms of the logical advance of doctrines, the following historical sequence can be discerned.

Stage 1. The recognition of the full divinity of Jesus Christ.

Stage 2. The recognition of the full divinity of the Spirit.

Stage 3. The definitive formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity, embedding and clarifying these central insights and determining their mutual relationship.

This sequential development was acknowledged by Gregory of Nazianzus, who pointed to a gradual progress in clarification and understanding of the mystery of God's revelation in the course of time. It was, he argued, impossible to deal with the question of the divinity of the Spirit until the issue of the divinity of Christ had been settled.

The Old Testament preached the Father openly and the Son more obscurely. The New Testament revealed the Son, and hinted at the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Now the Spirit dwells in us, and is revealed more clearly to us. It was not proper to preach the Son openly, while the divinity of the Father had not yet been admitted. Nor was it proper to accept the Holy Spirit before [the divinity of] the Son had been acknowledged. [...] Instead, by gradual advances and partial ascents, we should move forward and increase in clarity, so that the light of the Trinity should shine.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430): The Spirit as a Bond of Unity

One of the most significant contributions to the development of the theology of the Holy Spirit stems from Augustine. Augustine had become a Christian partly through the influence of Marius Victorinus, who had himself converted to Christianity from a pagan background. Victorinus had a distinct approach to the role of the Spirit, as can be seen from a hymn which he had penned:

Help us, Holy Spirit, the bond [copula] of Father and Son,
When you rest, you are the Father; when you proceed, the Son;
In binding all in one, you are the Holy Spirit.

Although the theology of these lines seems modalist (to anticipate a trinitarian heresy we shall explore presently; see pp. 308–10), an idea of considerable importance is nevertheless expressed: that the Spirit is the “bond of the Father and the Son [patris et filii copula].”

In his treatise On the Trinity, Augustine insists upon the distinctiveness of the Spirit; nevertheless, despite this distinctive identity, the Spirit is what is common to the Father and Son. The Father is only the Father of the Son, and the Son only the Son of the Father; the Spirit, however, is the Spirit of both Father and Son, binding them together in a bond of love. In his discussion of this point, Augustine concedes that Scripture does not explicitly state that the Holy Spirit is love; however, in that God is love, and the Spirit is God, it seems to follow naturally that the Holy Spirit is love:

Scripture teaches us that he is the Spirit neither of the Father alone nor of the Son alone, but of both; and this suggests to us the mutual love by which the Father and the Son love one another. [...] Yet Scripture has not said: “the Holy Spirit is love.” If it had, much of our inquiry would have been rendered unnecessary. Scripture does indeed say: “God is love” (1 John 4: 8, 16); and so leaves us to ask whether it is God the Father, or God the Son, or God the Holy Spirit, or God the Trinity itself, who is love.

Augustine regards the Spirit as the bond of unity between Father and Son, on the one hand, and between God and believers, on the other. The Spirit is a gift, given by God, which unites believers both to God and to other believers. The Holy Spirit forges bonds of unity between believers, upon which the unity of the church ultimately depends. The church is the “temple of the Holy Spirit,” within which the Holy Spirit dwells. The same Spirit which binds together the Father and Son in the unity of the Godhead also binds together believers in the unity of the church.

Symbols of the Spirit: A Dove, Fire, and Oil

One of the most interesting aspects of early Christianity is its rich use of symbols as ways of expressing its fundamental beliefs and values. Of those symbols, the most important is the cross. Christians were baptized with the sign of the cross. Churches and other Christian places of meeting did not merely include a cross; they were often built in the shape of a cross. Yet other symbols emerged as important around this time, including three which were specifically linked with the Holy Spirit. Each of these images – especially the first two – found a wide history of use in Christian worship.

A Dove

The gospel descriptions of the baptism of Jesus of Nazareth include reference to “the Spirit descending like a dove on him” (Mark 1: 10). From the fifth century onwards, the image of a dove came to be used to represent the Holy Spirit, especially in the context of Christian baptism. This was sometimes elaborated – for example, by stressing how Noah's dove (Genesis 8: 9–11) was a “type” (p. 115) of Christ. Ephrem the Syrian (c.306–73) offers a good example of this kind of typological reflection.

The ark marked out by its course the sign of its preserver
The cross of its steersman, and the wood of its sailor
Who has come to fashion for us a church in the water of baptism;
With the three-fold name he rescues those who live in her;
In the place of the dove, the Spirit ministers her anointing
And the mystery of her salvation.

This image was widely taken up in the Middle Ages, and is especially evident in the portrayal of the crucifixion of Christ. Many artistic representations of this event frame it in a Trinitarian perspective. Although the predominant image is a suffering Christ, that of the Father and a dove (representing the Spirit) are often incorporated into the background. The point being made is that redemption is a Trinitarian, not simply a Christological, event.

Fire

Pentecost, the Christian feast which focuses on the person of the Holy Spirit, is traditionally associated with the image of fire. This tradition goes back to the New Testament, which speaks of “divided tongues, as of fire,” appearing among those present on the original Day of Pentecost (Acts 2: 3). This imagery was widely used in Christian symbolism. For example, Ephrem the Syrian used the sun as an analogy of the Trinity: the sun itself corresponds to the Father, its light to the Son, and its heat to the Spirit. This symbol of the Spirit is often used to illuminate the manner in which the Holy Spirit purifies or sanctifies individuals, by burning off impurities – for example, as a refiner purifies metal.

Oil

A third image picks up on the rich associations of oil, particularly within the religious life of ancient Israel. Oil was used to anoint kings and priests of Israel, and was a symbol of divine acceptance or endorsement. As we saw earlier, the important Christological title “messiah” derives from the Hebrew word for “anointed.” Similarly, the prophet Elijah was told to anoint Elisha as his successor (1 Kings 19: 16). A text which was particularly important to the early church in this respect was Isaiah 61: 1, cited by Jesus of Nazareth at the beginning of his Galilean ministry: "The spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me, because the LORD has anointed me." Many saw a causal link between anointment with oil and the presence of the Spirit.

Having considered various approaches and issues which emerged during reflection on the doctrine of the Trinity, we must now turn to consider a debate which has been of considerable importance historically and theologically – namely, the manner in which the Holy Spirit is related to the Son. This controversy has come to be known as the "filioque controversy" and is considered in what follows.

The Filioque Controversy

One of the most significant events in the early history of the church was the achievement of broad agreement throughout the Roman empire, both east and west, on the text and leading ideas of the Nicene Creed (325). This document was intended to bring doctrinal stability to the church in a period of considerable importance in its history. Part of that agreed text referred to the Holy Spirit "proceeding from the Father." By the ninth century, however, the western church routinely altered this phrase, speaking of the Holy Spirit "proceeding from the Father and the Son." The Latin term filioque, which literally means "and from the Son," has since come to refer to this addition, now normative within the western church, and the theology which it expresses. This idea of a "double procession" of the Holy Spirit was a source of intense irritation to Greek writers: not only did it raise serious theological difficulties for them but it also involved tampering with the supposedly inviolable text of the creeds. Many scholars see this bad feeling as contributing to the split between the eastern and western churches, which took place around 1054 (see p. 22).

The filioque debate is of importance both as a theological issue in itself and as a matter of some importance in the contemporary relations between the eastern and western churches. We should therefore explore the issues in some detail. The basic issue at stake is whether the Spirit may be said to proceed from the Father alone, or from the Father and the Son. The former position is associated with the eastern church and is given its most weighty exposition in the writings of the Cappadocian fathers; the latter is associated with the western church and is developed in Augustine's treatise On the Trinity.

The Greek patristic writers insisted that there was only one source of being within the Trinity. The Father alone was the sole and supreme cause of all things, including the Son and the Spirit within the Trinity. The Son and the Spirit derive from the Father, but in different manners. In searching for suitable terms to express this relationship, theologians eventually fixed on two quite distinct images: the Son is begotten of the Father, while the Spirit proceeds from the Father. These two terms are intended to express the idea that both Son and Spirit derive from the Father, but in different ways. The vocabulary is somewhat cumbersome, reflecting the fact that the Greek words involved (gennesis and ekporeusis) are difficult to translate into modern English.

To assist in understanding this complex process, the Greek fathers used the imagery, strongly grounded in the biblical tradition, of the Son as the Word of God and the Spirit as the breath of God. The Father pronounces his word; at the same time as he utters this word, he breathes out in order to make this word capable of being heard and received. The visual imagery of a spoken word being propelled throughout the world thus helps to illuminate the distinctiveness of Son and Spirit while at the same time affirming their mutual involvement in the work of the Father.

So why should the Cappadocian fathers, along with other Greek theologians, spend so much time and effort on distinguishing Son and Spirit in this way? The answer is important. A failure to distinguish the ways in which Son and Spirit derive from one and the same Father would lead to God having two sons, which would have raised insurmountable problems. Identical functions would seem to imply identical essences. We saw earlier how the Tropici raised this issue as important; the answer lay in distinguishing the Spirit and Son in terms of their origination from the Father. The Son is begotten of the Father; the Spirit proceeds from the Father.

Within this context, the Cappadocians considered it to be unthinkable that the Holy Spirit should proceed from the Father and the Son. Why? Because it would totally compromise the principle of the Father as the sole origin and source of all divinity. It would amount to affirming that there were two sources of divinity within the one Godhead, with all the internal contradictions and tensions that this would generate. If the Son were to share in the exclusive ability of the Father to be the source of all divinity, this ability would no longer be exclusive. For this reason, the Greek church regarded the western idea of a “double procession” of the Spirit with something approaching stark disbelief.

The Greek tradition, however, was not entirely unanimous on this point. Cyril of Alexandria (c.378–444) had no hesitation in speaking of the Spirit as “belonging to the Son,” and related ideas were not slow to develop within the western church. Early western Christian writers were deliberately vague about the precise role of the Spirit within the Godhead. In his treatise On the Trinity, Hilary of Poitiers (c.300–68) contented himself with a declaration that he would “say nothing about [God's] Holy Spirit except that he is [God's] Spirit.” This vagueness led some of his readers to suspect that he was really a binitarian, believing in the full divinity only of the Father and the Son. However, in other passages from the same treatise, it becomes clear that Hilary regards the New Testament as pointing to the Spirit proceeding from both Father and Son, rather than from the Father alone.

This understanding of the procession of the Spirit from Father and Son was developed and given its classic statement by Augustine. Possibly building upon the position hinted at by Hilary, Augustine argued that the Spirit had to be thought of as proceeding from the Son. One of his main proof texts was John 20: 22, in which the risen Christ is reported as having breathed upon his disciples and as having said: “Receive the Holy Spirit.” Augustine explains this as follows in his major treatise On the Trinity:

Nor can we say that the Holy Spirit does not also proceed from the Son. After all, the Spirit is said to be the Spirit of both the Father and the Son. [John 20: 22 is then cited] The Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father, but also from the Son.

In making this statement, Augustine thought that he was summarizing a general consensus within both the eastern and western churches.

Unfortunately, his knowledge of Greek does not appear to have been good enough to allow him to appreciate that the Greek-speaking Cappadocian writers adopted a rather different position.

Nevertheless, there are points at which Augustine is obviously concerned to defend the distinctive role of the Father within the Godhead:

There is good reason why in this Trinity we speak of the Son alone as Word of God, of the Holy Spirit alone as Gift of God, and of God the Father alone as the one of whom the Word is begotten and from whom the Holy Spirit principally proceeds. I add the word “principally,” because we learn that the Holy Spirit proceeds also from the Son. But this is again something given by the Father to the Son – not that he ever existed without it, for all that the Father gives to his only-begotten Word he gives in the act of begetting him. He is begotten in such a manner that the common gift proceeds from him as well, and the Holy Spirit is Spirit of both.

So what did Augustine think he was doing in understanding the role of the Spirit in this way? The answer lies in his distinctive understanding of the Spirit as the “bond of love” between Father and Son, which we considered earlier (p. 285). Augustine argued that the persons of the Trinity are defined by their relations to one another. The Spirit is thus to be seen as the relation of love and fellowship between the Father and Son, a relation which Augustine believed to be foundational to the fourth gospel's presentation of the unity of will and purpose of Father and Son.

We can summarize the root differences between the two approaches as follows. The Greek intention was to safeguard the unique position of the Father as the sole source of divinity. As both the Son and Spirit derive from him, although in different but equally valid manners, their divinity is in turn safeguarded. To the Greeks, the Latin approach seemed to introduce two separate sources of divinity into the Godhead, and to weaken the vital distinction between Son and Spirit. The Son and Spirit are understood to have distinct yet complementary roles, whereas the western tradition sees the Spirit as the Spirit of Christ. Indeed, a number of modern writers from this tradition, such as the Russian writer Vladimir Lossky (1903–58), have criticized the western approach. In his essay “The Procession of the Holy Spirit,” Lossky argues that the western approach inevitably depersonalizes the Spirit, leads to a misplaced emphasis upon the person and work of Christ, and reduces the Godhead to an impersonal principle.

The Latin intention was to ensure that the Son and Spirit were adequately distinguished from one another yet shown to be mutually related to one another. The strongly relational approach to the idea of “person” adopted made it inevitable that the Spirit would be treated in this way. Sensitive to the Greek position, later Latin writers stressed that they did not regard their approach as presupposing two sources of divinity in the Godhead. This was made especially clear by the Eleventh Council of Toledo (675):

We believe that the Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, is God, one and equal with God the Father and God the Son, of one substance and of one nature; not, however, begotten or created, but proceeding from both, and that He is the Spirit of both. We also believe that the Holy Spirit is neither unbegotten nor begotten, for if we called Him “unbegotten” we would assert two Fathers, or if we called him “begotten” we would appear to preach two Sons. Yet He is called the Spirit not of the Father alone, nor of the Son alone, but of both Father and Son. For He does not proceed from the Father to the Son, nor from the Son to sanctify creatures, but He is shown to have proceeded from both at once, because He is known as the love or the holiness of both. Hence we believe that the Holy Spirit is sent by both, as the Son is sent by the Father. But He is not less than the Father and the Son.

Similar ideas were stated by later councils. Thus, the Council of Lyons (1274) stated that “the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, yet not as from two origins but as from one origin.”

However, despite such clarifications, the doctrine remains a source of contention between eastern and western Christians which is unlikely to be removed in the foreseeable future, despite a recent warming of personal and institutional relations between the eastern and western churches.

The Holy Spirit: Recent Discussions

The Holy Spirit has been the subject of considerable theological discussion in the modern period, especially as a result of the charismatic renewal movement, which began in the early twentieth century. The origins of Pentecostalism are usually traced to Bethel Bible College, in Topeka, Kansas. This institution had been founded in the holiness tradition by Charles Fox Parham (1873–1929), a former pastor in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Parham asked his students to investigate the New Testament evidence for the continued activity of the Holy Spirit in the Christian life. The theological wisdom of the day took the form of “cessationism,” widely taught by the Protestant theological establishment, which held that the active gifts of the Holy Spirit, such as “speaking in tongues,” belonged to the age of the New Testament itself and were no longer available or operational.

Parham was not so sure. Within his own holiness tradition, reports were circulating of what seemed to be charismatic phenomena. During a prayer vigil on December 31, 1900, a student at the college had such an experience. Others soon followed. Parham and his students began to tell others about this apparent recovery of the “gift of tongues.” One of those who heard Parham speak in 1905 was the African-American preacher William J. Seymour (1870–1922), who opened the Apostolic Faith Mission in Azusa Street, Los Angeles, in April 1906.

Over the next two years, a major revival broke out at Azusa Street, characterized by “speaking in tongues.” The term “Pentecostalism” began to be applied to the movement, taking its name from the Day of Pentecost – the occasion, according to the New Testament, when the phenomenon was first experienced by the early Christian disciples (Acts 2: 1–4). Pentecostalism rapidly transcended its American roots and became a global faith. Pentecostalism and other charismatic groups have established a significant presence in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

The emergence of the charismatic movement led to a new interest in the theology of the Holy Spirit, and particularly to the retrieval of more experiential approaches to religious thought and life. Although many would argue that there are distinct charismatic theological emphases – such as the activity of the Spirit in the world – the dominant trend now appears to be the influence of charismatic ideas within Catholicism and mainstream Protestant denominations.

In this section, we shall consider some important discussions of the Spirit during this period, beginning with an important contribution to the discussion of the Christological role of the Holy Spirit from the leading American theologian of the eighteenth century, Jonathan Edwards.

The Great Awakening: Jonathan Edwards (1703–58)

Jonathan Edwards is widely regarded as one of America's most significant theologians. Edwards played a leading role in the “Great Awakening” in New England during the 1740s, and regarded the spiritual renewal of that period as the work of the Holy Spirit. He published a number of works defending this view, including A Faithful Narrative (1737) and Religious Affections (1746). The experiential aspects of the “Great Awakening” convinced Edwards that his own Reformed religious tradition had neglected the theology of the Spirit.

Like Augustine, Edwards conceived the Holy Spirit as the personal divine love within the Godhead, binding the Father and Son together in a union of affection. This affection can be communicated to the hearts of created beings in such a way that they too can be united to God.

Communion of the creatures with God or with one another in God, seems to be by the Holy Ghost. 'Tis by this that believers have communion with Christ, and I suppose 'tis by this that the man Christ Jesus has communion with the eternal Logos. The Spirit of God is the bond of perfectness by which God, Jesus Christ, and the church are united together.

Edwards's theology includes elements of “deification” which reflect this emphasis on the transformative role of the Holy Spirit. However, he more typically framed this transformation in terms of “regeneration,” understood as “that great change that is wrought in man by the mighty power of God, at his conversion from sin to God,” in which he is “changed from a wicked to a holy man.” Edwards sees this transition as the work of the Spirit.

Yet Edwards's most interesting reflections on the Holy Spirit relate to his Christology. For Edwards, the Holy Spirit plays a decisive role in the hypostatic union, serving as the basis of the union of humanity and divinity within the single person of Jesus Christ. It is “by the Spirit that divine knowledge and consciousness is given to the man Jesus.” The Holy Spirit unites the human nature of Christ to the divine nature. In doing so, the Spirit does not act as an additional divine being within the person of Christ, but is rather the means by which the unity and the integrity of both natures are maintained.

The Second Vatican Council on the Holy Spirit

One of the major achievements of the Second Vatican Council was to develop a coherent theology of the Holy Spirit, indicating not merely its roots in the Bible and tradition but also its relevance to the life of the church. In preparing for the Second Vatican Council, John XXIII (1881–1963) suggested that the church needed to take the charismatic movement seriously yet be critical. This can be seen from his prayer of 1962: “Renew Your Wonders in This Our Day, as by a New Pentecost.”

The Catholic church had responded warily to the rise of Pentecostalism and other charismatic movements, which it regarded as excessively dependent on the presence and manifestation of spiritual gifts, believed to be bestowed by the Holy Spirit on individuals and the church. However, with the passing of time, views began to change. Charismatic renewal retrieved and renewed the experiential aspects of faith, and could be incorporated within the life and structures of the church. Joseph Ratzinger (later Benedict XVI, born 1927), for example, pointed out that “a dogmatic faith unsupported by personal experience remains empty; mere personal experience unrelated to the faith of the Church remains blind.”

Lumen Gentium (“The Light of the Nations”), the Council’s “Dogmatic Constitution on the Church,” reaffirmed the importance of the Holy Spirit for the life and witness of the church.

When the work which the Father gave the Son to do on earth was accomplished, the Holy Spirit was sent on the day of Pentecost in order that He might continually sanctify the Church, and thus, all those who believe would have access through Christ in one Spirit to the Father. [...] The Spirit dwells in the Church and in the hearts of the faithful, as in a temple.

So how does this work out in the mission of the church? This is best seen from the decree Ad Gentes (“To the People”), on the mission of the church. This document emphasizes the importance of the incarnation and notes the centrality of the salvation resulting from the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ to the mission of the church. But how is this to be effected?

To accomplish this, Christ sent from the Father His Holy Spirit, who was to carry on inwardly His saving work and prompt the Church to spread out. Doubtless, the Holy Spirit was already at work in the world before Christ was glorified. Yet on the day of Pentecost, He came down upon the disciples to remain with them forever (cf. John 14: 16).

The Holy Spirit serves multiple functions. It is through the Spirit that people are enabled to grasp the basic themes of faith, and respond to it, in a new life of discipleship. Yet this is not a solitary life. The Spirit gathers believers “into the one People of God.” It is from this communal context that the mission of the church takes place, reaching out beyond the boundaries of the church as an institution.

The Second Vatican Council retained an institutional understanding of the church, including its missionary organizations and structures. Yet it affirmed the importance of allowing the Holy Spirit to work in and through them, not being restricted by them. New ministerial functions or organizations might emerge, through the prompting of the Holy Spirit, as a sign of the “complete dedication” of the church to “the evangelization of the world.”

In one sense, the Council's views on the Holy Spirit are not particularly innovative. They represent a retrieval of some classic themes of Christian theology of the Holy Spirit, given a new relevance through the rise of the charismatic movement on the one hand and the growing importance of the missionary task on the other. Yet the Council also recognized the importance of the Holy Spirit in the transformation of society. Gaudium et Spes (“Joy and Hope”) speaks of the Holy Spirit guiding the social order toward a fuller and deeper realization of justice and freedom by “animating, purifying, and strengthening [human] noble longings” to achieve human dignity in society. These ideas would find fuller expression in Latin American liberation theology, to which we now turn.

Liberation Theology: The Spirit and Empowerment

We have already noted the importance of liberation theology as a distinctive movement within the Catholic church in Latin America. In some respects, liberation theology can be seen as a response to the revolutionary fervor which gained the ascendancy in many parts of Latin America in the 1960s and beyond. It was during this period, for example, that the Cuban revolution took place, with its president Fidel Castro (born 1926) adopting an explicitly Marxist agenda, which he attempted to export to other nations in the region. Many liberation theologians valued Marxism as a tool of social analysis, seeing it as helping them to do theology in their context in much the same way as Aristotle helped Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74) in his theological task.

Yet there is no doubt that there was a significant theological component to liberation theology's vision for the renewal of society, partly arising from the Second Vatican Council and partly from reflection on the significance of charismatic renewal for the institutions and structures of the church. For many liberation theologians, the Spirit poses a challenge to institutional visions of the church, which too easily become forces of social conservatism and privilege.

José Comblin (1923–2011) was a Belgian theologian who emigrated to Brazil in 1958. His Holy Spirit and Liberation (1987) is widely regarded as one of the best accounts of the significance of the Holy Spirit for liberation theology. Comblin appeals to Irenaeus's phrase, "Where the church is, there too is the Spirit of God." The Spirit is present wherever the poor are awakening to action and freedom and are gathering in community. Comblin's appeal to the Spirit was unusual in the liberation theology of the 1980s, which tended to focus specifically on Jesus Christ as a figure of liberation. For Comblin, the new realization of the importance of the Spirit marked the end of traditional understandings of the church as an institution, modeled on human organizations. The First Vatican Council had articulated a strongly institutional model of the church. Yet the conceptual triad "Father–Son–Church" had to give way to the more theologically appropriate "Father–Son–Holy Spirit" and the more communitarian visions of the church that this entailed.

For Comblin, the Spirit encourages new forms of community "for the sake of transformation of the world, through the liberation of the poor and oppressed." The Spirit's creative and energizing power motivates communities of the poor to become agents of their own freedom, and to work toward a renewed and just society. The Holy Spirit "gathers the poor together so as to make them a new people who challenge all the powers of the earth." Comblin links this liberationist agenda with the church – understood not as a hierarchical institution but as a community of believers. The Holy Spirit is present in all its members, empowering them to transform cultures and societies that do not yet reflect God's justice and love.

Leonardo Boff (born 1938) also regarded a correct understanding of the Holy Spirit as countering strongly institutional models of the church. His Church: Charism and Power (1985) was severely critical of what he regarded as the authoritarian character of the church, and argued for the importance of more accountable and supportive church communities. This was given more theological weight in his study Trinity and Society (1988), in which he argued that the Christian understanding of God as Trinity offers a model for relationships within society, the family, and the church. The Trinity, when properly understood, undergirds the social project of liberation by providing a model of a “divine society.” This could act as the basis for a vision for society, family, and church in which there are coequal relationships, with no place for a hierarchy or oppression.

Feminism: The Spirit and Relationality

Elizabeth Johnson (born 1941), a Catholic professor of systematic theology at Fordham University, New York, has been a particularly significant contributor to recent feminist discussions about the role of the Holy Spirit, especially in her landmark publications She Who is: The Mystery of God in Feminist Theological Discourse (1992) and Women, Earth and Creator Spirit (1993). Throughout these works, Johnson refers to the Spirit as “she.”

Why is this important? At one level, it represents a traditional feminist critique of male images of God as damaging for women. Yet there is another point that needs to be made. The Greek word for “spirit” (pneuma), used extensively in the New Testament, is grammatically neuter. For this reason, many translations refer to the Holy Spirit as “it,” thus depersonalizing the Spirit. Yet in Syriac, one of the languages used by the earliest Christians, the word for “spirit” (ruha) is grammatically female. More importantly, most Syriac Christian writers refer to the Holy Spirit in feminine terms, occasionally designating it as “mother.” The classic example of this is the Demonstrations of Aphrahat the Syrian (c.270–c.345), which refer to the Spirit in the following way in a comment on Genesis 2: 24:

As long as a man has not taken a wife, he loves and reveres God as his Father and the Holy Spirit as his Mother, and he has no other love. But when a man takes a wife, he leaves his (true) Father and his Mother.

In the fourth and fifth centuries, most Christian writers began to speak of the Holy Spirit in masculine terms. But many modern theologians wonder whether these older texts preserve an important insight. Johnson's work reflects this older tradition.

One of Johnson's leading themes is that a proper understanding of the person and work of the Holy Spirit opens up new understandings of creation and our place within it. Johnson argues that there are three ways in which Christians can experience the Spirit's presence in creation: first, through the immanent presence of the Spirit in nature; second, through the Spirit's presence (and absence) in relationships; and, third, through the Spirit's presence (and absence) in societal systems and structures. Johnson offers her reflections on the Holy Spirit as a way of understanding God's presence in the world.

Emphasizing the presence of the Holy Spirit within creation, Johnson suggests that this recognition leads to two important insights. First, it helps us to appreciate the creative agency of the Spirit (as seen, for example, in Genesis 1: 1) while helping us to understand how the natural world is capable of disclosing God (Romans 1: 20). Second, it provides us with a deeper vision of nature, helping us to appreciate our own distinct place within it. Sensitive to the Darwinian account of the origin of biological species, Johnson suggests that to affirm the presence of God's Spirit in creation forces us to “extend moral consideration to species beyond our own, and moral standing to ecological systems as a whole.”

Johnson builds on this analysis to suggest that a theological position that emphasizes the immanence of the Holy Spirit in all of the creation calls into question any human assumption of privilege within the natural world. A belief in the presence of the Spirit in creation challenges us to move away from an anthropocentric view of the world to a more eco-centric view, which calls for a respectful love for creation that transcends a mere appreciation of its utility for human beings. We are given a theological framework that invites us “to preserve bio-diversity,” in that “when a species becomes extinct we have lost a manifestation of the goodness of God.”

Yet the presence of the Spirit is not restricted to nature; it extends to the world of human relationships, especially the love of human beings for each other. “We seek and are found by the Spirit in the person – creating give and take of loving relationships, in each fresh, particular discovery of the other's beauty in the strength of ongoing fidelity.” Johnson suggests that we can think of the absence of love in human life as an experience of the absence of God's Spirit. Yet such experiences of absence can be seen positively, in that they can help “motivate critical resistance to evil.” The experience of the absence of God's spirit is also important in the third area of Johnson's analysis – societal structures. The Spirit is the source of a relationality which reflects the Spirit's distinct identity as “love, gift and friend both to the world and within the holy mystery of God.”

Finally, Johnson comprehends that recognizing the Spirit as the source of relationality offers insights into a feminist analysis of power structures. It challenges people to engage situations which reflect damaged and flawed relationships, such as the oppression of women, the injustices meted out to the poor, and damage to our environment. A proper understanding of the Spirit encourages us to seek “the flourishing of all beings in their uniqueness and interrelation – both sexes, all races and social groups, all creatures in the universe.” This vision of a proper relationality is not well served by replacing males with females in positions of authority. Johnson calls for the reform of patriarchal language about God that legitimates a patriarchal culture that excludes women and exploits nature but avoids the fallacy of simply inverting existing social structures. Something more radical is required – and Johnson believes this lies in a proper understanding of the person and work of the Spirit.

The Functions of the Spirit

What does the Holy Spirit do? Many theologians have tried to provide brief summaries of the work of the Spirit. For example, Basil of Caesarea made the succinct statement, “Through the Holy Spirit we are restored to paradise, led back to the Kingdom of heaven, adopted as children, given confidence to call God ‘Father’ and to share in Christ's grace, called children of light, and given a share in eternal glory.” The Christian tradition has generally understood the work of the Holy Spirit to focus on four broad areas: God's presence in the world, God's self-disclosure through revelation, the appropriation of salvation, and energization of the Christian life. In what follows, we shall provide a brief indication of the Christian understanding of the role of the Spirit in each of these four areas.

God's Active Presence in the World

A central theme in any understanding of the person and work of the Holy Spirit relates to God's presence and action in the world beyond the boundaries of Christian communities. The Spirit is seen as active in the world, preparing hearts and minds for an encounter with God. One of the most familiar statements of this theme is found in Ambrosiaster's famous statement: "whatever truth is said by anyone is said by the Holy Spirit." This theme is found in many Christian writers, and is now often paraphrased as "all truth is God's truth." However, the original reference makes it clear that the Holy Spirit is seen as leading people to truth, and hence to God.

This emphasis on the Holy Spirit as God's active presence in the world has been a major theme in recent theological reflection on the nature of mission and evangelism. In his encyclical letter Dominum et Vivificantem ("Lord and Giver of Life"), published on Pentecost 1986, John Paul II (1920–2005) emphasized that the Holy Spirit is actively present when anyone confronts and attempts to answer ultimate questions in life, including religious questions. The activity of God is not limited to the church as the body of Christ; God is already present in the world, illuminating and informing minds. A similar point was made in the 1990 encyclical Redemptoris Missio ("The Mission of Christ the Redeemer"):

The Spirit manifests himself in a special way in the Church and in her members. Nevertheless, his presence and activity are universal, limited neither by space nor time. The Second Vatican Council recalls that the Spirit is at work in the heart of every person, through the "seeds of the Word," to be found in human initiatives – including religious ones – and in mankind's efforts to attain truth, goodness and God himself.

There is a potential difficulty here. If too much emphasis is placed on the uniqueness of the work of the Holy Spirit in the world, it might be concluded that the work of the Spirit is independent of, and potentially unrelated to, the work of Jesus Christ. On the other hand, emphasizing the unity of the divine work in the world could create the impression that the missions of the Son and the Spirit are indistinguishable.

Redemptoris Missio recognizes this point, and emphasizes that this general work of the Spirit in the world is not to be seen as “an alternative to Christ” but as a means of leading people to Christ. The work of the Spirit is set in the context of a Trinitarian understanding of the “economy of salvation.” It is not seen as an independent or self-serving activity but as a means of leading human hearts and minds to discover and embrace the fullness of God.

Whatever the Spirit brings about in human hearts and in the history of peoples, in cultures and religions serves as a preparation for the Gospel and can only be understood in reference to Christ, the Word who took flesh by the power of the Spirit so that as perfectly human he would save all human beings and sum up all things.

The Illumination of Revelation

There has been a widespread recognition of the pivotal role of the Spirit in relation to God becoming known to humanity through revelation, whether in Christ or through the Bible. Irenaeus thus wrote of the “Holy Spirit, through whom the prophets prophesied, and our forebears learned of God and the righteous were led in the paths of justice.” True knowledge of God comes about through the work of the Holy Spirit. The task of the Holy Spirit is to lead into God's truth; without that Spirit, truth remains elusive. In his 1536 commentary on the gospels, the sixteenth-century Protestant theologian Martin Bucer (1491–1551) argued that revelation cannot occur without the assistance of God's Spirit:

Before we believe in God and are inspired by the Holy Spirit, we are unspiritual and for that reason we are completely unable to apprehend anything relating to God. So all the wisdom and righteousness which we possess in the absence of the Holy Spirit are the darkness and shadow of death.

The role of the Spirit in relation to the most important theological source of the Christian tradition is of particular importance. The doctrine of the “inspiration of Scripture” affirms that the Bible has a God-given authority by virtue of its origins. This doctrine, in various forms, is the common tradition of Christianity, and has its origins in the Bible itself, most notably the affirmation that “every Scripture is God-breathed [theopneustos]” (2 Timothy 3: 16). Although Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant theologians will disagree over the relative weighting to be given to the Bible in theological reflection, all agree that it is set apart from other texts on account of its apostolic origins and its inspiration by the Holy Spirit.

In Protestant theology, however, the doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture serves an additional purpose – that of insisting on the primacy of Scripture over the church. Whereas more Catholic writers point to the formation of the canon of Scripture as indicating the authority of the church over Scripture, Protestant writers argue that the church merely recognized an authority which was already present within Scripture itself. The Gallic Confession (1559) illustrates this point well:

We know these books to be canonical, and the sure rule of our faith, not so much by the common accord and consent of the Church, as by the testimony and inward persuasion of the Holy Spirit, which enables us to distinguish them from other ecclesiastical books which, however useful, can never become the basis for any articles of faith.

Yet it is not simply God's revelation which is linked with the work of the Spirit; the Spirit is also widely regarded as being involved in the human response to that revelation. Most Christian theologians have regarded faith itself as the result of the work of the Holy Spirit. John Calvin (1509–64) is one writer who draws attention to the pivotal role of the Spirit in revealing God's truth and applying or “sealing” this truth to humanity.

Now we shall have a right definition of faith if we say that it is a steady and certain knowledge of the divine benevolence towards us, which is founded upon the truth of the gracious promise of God in Christ, and is both revealed to our minds and sealed in our hearts by the Holy Spirit.

The Appropriation of Salvation

We have already noted how patristic writers justified the divinity of the Spirit with reference to the functions of the Spirit. Many of those functions relate directly to the doctrine of salvation; for example, the role of the Spirit in sanctification, making humanity like God, and divinization (theosis). This point is particularly important within the eastern Christian churches, with their traditional emphasis on deification. The Orthodox theologian Basil Krivocheine (1900–85) emphasized the central role of the Holy Spirit in bringing about divinization:

Divinization is the state of man's total transformation, effected by the Holy Spirit, when man observes the commandments of God, acquires the evangelical virtues and shares in the sufferings of Christ. The Holy Spirit then gives man a divine intelligence and incorruptibility. Man does not receive a new soul, but the Holy Spirit unites essentially with the whole man, body and soul.

As noted earlier (pp. 293–4), western concepts of salvation tend to be relational rather than ontological. Nevertheless, they also emphasize the role for the Spirit in appropriating salvation. Thus, in Calvin's doctrine of the application of salvation, the Holy Spirit plays a major role in relation to the establishment of a living relationship between Christ and believer. For Calvin, the “gracious promise of God in Christ” is both “revealed to our minds and sealed in our hearts by the Holy Spirit.” This can be seen more clearly in some of the Reformed confessions of this age, such as the Belgic Confession (1561):

We believe that, to attain the true knowledge of this great mystery, the Holy Spirit creates in our hearts an upright faith, which embraces Jesus Christ with all his merits, takes hold of him, and seeks nothing more besides him.

A similar point is made in Catholic theology. For example, the “Dogmatic Constitution on Revelation” of the Second Vatican Council regularly affirms the critical role of the Spirit in preparing the human mind and heart for revelation and salvation. “To make this act of faith, the grace of God and the interior help of the Holy Spirit must precede and assist, moving the heart and turning it to God, opening the eyes of the mind and giving joy and ease to everyone in assenting to the truth and believing it.” A similar point about the role of the Holy Spirit in the appropriation of salvation is made by the Catechism of the Catholic Church: “The grace of the Holy Spirit has the power to justify us, that is, to cleanse us from our sins and to communicate to us the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ and through Baptism.”

The Renewal of the Christian Life

For many writers, the Holy Spirit plays an especially important role in relation to the Christian life, both individual and corporate. The fifth-century writer Cyril of Alexandria is one of many to have stressed the role of the Spirit in bringing unity within the church:

All of us who have received the one and the same Spirit, that is, the Holy Spirit, are in a sense merged together with one another and with God. [...] Just as the power of the holy flesh of Christ united those in whom it dwells into one body, I think that, in much the same way, the one and undivided Spirit of God, who dwells in us all, leads us all into spiritual unity.

Another classic statement of the work of the Holy Spirit in renewing believers and the church is found in the liturgical sequence Veni

Sancte Spiritus (“Come Holy Spirit”), traditionally attributed to the medieval theologian Stephen Langton (c.1150–1228) and sometimes known as the “Golden Sequence.” This hymn speaks of the work of the Spirit using a number of images, all focusing on the Spirit's role in recreating, renewing, healing, and redirecting human nature. The Latin text of this sequence will be familiar to some readers and is difficult to translate into English without losing its rhyme and rhythm. A few stanzas of the original Latin are printed out below, along with my translation, to give an idea of the comprehensive vision of the function of the Spirit found in this famous liturgical piece.

Lava quod est sordidum, riga quod est aridum,

sana quod est saucium.

Flecte quod est rigidum, fove quod est frigidum,

rege quod est devium.

(“Wash what is dirty; refresh what is dry; heal what is wounded; bend what is stubborn; melt what is frozen; direct what is wandering.”)

However, any properly Christian understanding of the role of the Spirit in renewing individuals and the church will go far beyond this and will include reference to at least two other themes. First, there is the “making real” of God in personal and corporate worship and devotion. The importance of the role of the Spirit in relation to Christian prayer, spirituality, and worship has been stressed by many writers, classical and modern. Second is the enabling of believers to lead a Christian life, particularly in relation to morality. Martin Bucer thus draws attention to the necessity of the Spirit, if believers are to keep the law:

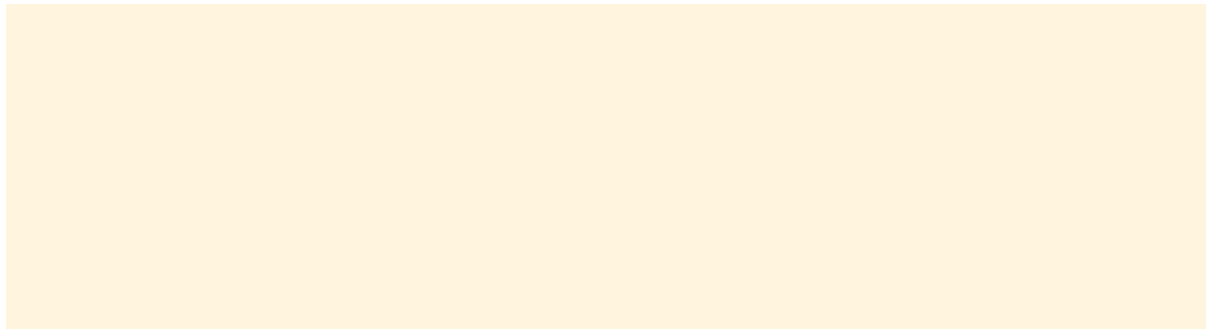

So those who believe are not under the law, because they have the Spirit within them, teaching them everything more perfectly than the law ever could, and motivating them much more powerfully to obey it. In other words, the Holy Spirit moves the heart, so that believers wish to live by those things which the law commands, but which the law could not achieve by itself.

Yet the Christian life is corporate, not just individual, and it is important to note the ecclesiological dimensions of the work of the Holy Spirit. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–5), many Catholic theologians have explored the role of the Spirit in shaping and sustaining Christian community, and fostering its witness in the world. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1994) thus speaks of the church as both “the Body of Christ and the Temple of the Holy Spirit.”

The Spirit prepares people, and goes out to them with his grace, in order to draw them to Christ. The Spirit manifests the risen Lord to them, recalls his word to them and opens their minds to the understanding of his Death and Resurrection.

As we noted earlier (p. 292), growing interest in the theology of mission, linked with an increasing awareness of the importance of tracing God's imprints in other cultures and faiths, has led many to explore the role of the Spirit in the world, preparing the way for the proclamation of Christ.

In this chapter, we have considered some themes in the person and work of the Holy Spirit. We are now ready to move on to discuss one of the most distinctive – and, many would say, difficult aspects of the Christian understanding of God: the doctrine of the Trinity.

THE TRINITY

The doctrine of the Trinity is widely regarded as one of the most difficult aspects of Christian theology. Many who are new to the study of theology find the doctrine perplexing. This chapter sets out to introduce this tricky yet immensely important doctrine, explaining carefully why it is such a fundamental aspect of the Christian vision of God. Because of the difficulty of the idea, we will spend more time examining its foundations and origins than normal. By the end of this discussion, you will hopefully feel more confident about this doctrine, in terms of understanding both the reasons why Christians believe it and the various ways they have developed of explaining it.

Approaching the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity

A number of readers will approach this chapter with some hesitations, many of which may reflect anxieties about the subject's apparent irrationality. How did the Christian church come to regard such a counterintuitive notion as the Trinity as fundamental to its vision of God? We may begin by considering some expressions of anxiety about the doctrine and then move on to consider how these can be met.

The Apparent Illogicality of the Doctrine

Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826), the third president of the United States, was one of the leading critics of orthodox Christian theology in the early nineteenth century. He reserved his most ferocious criticisms for the doctrine of the Trinity. These “metaphysical insanities,” he declared, hindered the religious growth of humanity, in that they represented “relapses into polytheism, differing from paganism only by being more unintelligible.” So why has Christianity persistently upheld such a doctrine?

The fundamental issue here is the inability of human language to do justice to the transcendent. Human language finds itself pressed to its limits when trying to depict and describe the divine. Words and images are borrowed from everyday life and put to new uses in an attempt to capture and preserve precious insights into the nature of God. The Christian understanding of both the divine and human natures is such that – if it is right – we are unable to grasp the full reality of God. Can the human mind ever hope to comprehend something which must ultimately lie beyond its ability to enfold?

When I began to study theology at Oxford back in the mid-1970s, I was taught early medieval theology by Edward J. Yarnold (1926–2002), a Jesuit scholar at Campion Hall. As we walked to his room together, we passed a large painting depicting an old man in conversation with a young boy by the seashore. What was it, I asked? And so I was told the famous story about Augustine of Hippo (354–430), who is particularly noted for his massive treatise On the Trinity, dealing with the mystery of God. Perhaps in the midst of composing this treatise, I was told, Augustine found himself pacing the Mediterranean shoreline of his native North Africa, not far from the great city of Carthage. While wandering across the sand, he noticed a small boy scooping seawater into his hands and pouring as much as he could hold into a hole in the sand. Puzzled, Augustine watched as this action was repeated again and again.

Eventually, his curiosity got the better of him. What, he asked the boy, did he think he was doing? The reply probably perplexed Augustine still further. The youth told him that he was busy emptying the ocean into the small cavity he had scooped out in the hot sand. Augustine was dismissive: how could such a vast body of water be contained in such a small hole? The boy was equally dismissive in return: how could Augustine expect to contain the vast mystery of God in the mere words of a book?

The story illuminates one of the central themes of Christian theology and spirituality alike – that there are limits placed upon the human ability to grasp the things of God. Our knowledge of God is accommodated to our capacity. As writers from Augustine to Calvin have argued, God knows the limitations placed upon human nature – which, after all, is itself a divine creation. God therefore both discloses divine truths and enters into our world, in forms that are tempered and adapted to our limited abilities and competencies.

For Augustine, the point was simple: Si comprehendis non est Deus (a loose translation is “If you can get your mind around it, it's not God”). He didn't mean that belief in God was contrary to reason; rather, reason was too limited to grasp the fullness of the majesty and glory of God. Our thoughts about God are bound to seem illogical and muddled, precisely because what they refer to lies beyond our full knowledge and understanding. For Augustine, any attempt to reduce God to the intellectually manageable distorts God. We need to open up our minds to the greatness of God, rather than reduce God to something that we can cope with.

The Swiss Protestant theologian Emil Brunner (1889–1966) took a similar view, arguing that the Trinity was really a “protective doctrine” (German: Schutzlehre) designed to safeguard the rich Christian understanding of God from well-meaning attempts to reduce or simplify it. The Trinity was not itself revealed in the Bible but was the result of serious reflection on what was implied by the biblical proclamation (Greek: kerygma).

The doctrine of the Trinity is the product of reflection, and is not the kerygma. The kerygma is God revealed in Christ – Christ, the genuine revelation of God. The doctrine of the Trinity, however, is not itself biblical [...] but is the result of theological reflection upon the problem that is necessarily raised by the Christian kerygma.

Traditionally, Christian theology has been well aware of its limits and has sought to avoid excessively confident affirmations in the face of mystery. Yet, at the same time, Christian theology has never seen itself as totally reduced to silence in the face of divine mysteries. Nor has it prohibited intellectual wrestling with “mysteries” that might be destructive or detrimental to faith. As the nineteenth-century Anglican theologian Charles Gore (1853–1932) insisted:

Human language never can express adequately divine realities. A constant tendency to apologize for human speech, a great element of agnosticism, an awful sense of unfathomed depths beyond the little that is made known, is always present to the mind of theologians who know what they are about, in conceiving or expressing God. “We see,” says St. Paul, “in a mirror, in terms of a riddle”; “we know in part.” “We are compelled,” complains St. Hilary, “to attempt what is unattainable, to climb where we cannot reach, to speak what we cannot utter; instead of the mere adoration of faith, we are compelled to entrust the deep things of religion to the perils of human expression.”

A perfectly good definition of Christian theology is “taking rational trouble over a mystery,” recognizing that there may be limits to what can be achieved but believing that this intellectual grappling is both worthwhile and necessary. Theology is confronted with something so great that we cannot fully comprehend it, and so must do the best that we can with the analytical and descriptive tools at our disposal.

The Trinity as a Statement About Jesus Christ

The distinctively Christian doctrine of God took shape in response to a question about the identity of Jesus Christ. The development of the doctrine of the Trinity is best seen as organically related to the evolution of Christology (see pp. 15–18, 214–24). As we noted earlier, a patristic consensus emerged that Jesus was “of the same substance” (homoousios) as God, rather than just being “of similar substance” (homoiousios). But, if Jesus was God, in any meaningful sense of the word, what did this imply about existing notions of God? If Jesus was God, were there now two Gods? Or was a radical reconsideration of the nature of God appropriate? Historically, it is possible to argue that the doctrine of the Trinity is closely linked with the development of the doctrine of the divinity of Christ. The more emphatic the church became that Christ was God, the more it came under pressure to clarify how Christ related to God. “If the Word had not been made flesh, there would have been no stumbling block for Jewish monotheism” (A. W. Wainwright).

The Trinity as a Statement About the Christian God

It is generally agreed that the doctrine of the Trinity emerged from the distinctively Christian understanding of the identity of Jesus Christ. The incarnation – a concept we considered in some detail in Chapter 10 – does not simply concern the identity of Jesus of Nazareth. It also concerns the distinctive nature and character of the God who became incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth. The doctrine of the Trinity can thus be seen as an attempt to describe faithfully a God who, while remaining transcendent, also became incarnate in Christ – and, more than that, who now dwells within believers in the Holy Spirit.

Islamic Critiques of the Doctrine of the Trinity

The three great monotheistic faiths of the world – Christianity, Islam, and Judaism – share a belief that there is only one supreme being, the Lord and creator of the universe. This is summarized in an Old Testament verse, known as the Shema: “Hear, O Israel, the Lord your God is one Lord” (Deuteronomy 6: 4).

Some interpreters of Islam believe that Christians worship three distinct gods, an idea which is clearly inconsistent with the Islamic emphasis on the absolute unity of God (Arabic: tawhid). Although there are reasons for suspecting that early Islam may have encountered heterodox forms of Christian belief in Arabia, including unorthodox statements of the Trinity, it seems more likely that the orthodox doctrine has been misunderstood as implying either that Christians worship three gods or that they worship a single God with three component parts. The early Christian emphasis on the undivided authority of God (Greek: monarchia) is important in this respect, paralleling in some ways the idea of tawhid. Christians do not see the doctrine of the Trinity as compromising or contradicting the unity or sovereignty of God, but as ensuring that the richness and depth of the Christian understanding of God is fully grasped and expressed.

In view of the importance of this aspect of the doctrine of the Trinity, we shall move on immediately to consider its foundations in the Bible, before exploring its development within the long tradition of Christian reflection on the biblical witness to the identity and actions of God.

The Biblical Foundations of the Doctrine of the Trinity

At first sight, there are only two verses in the entire Bible which are explicitly trinitarian: Matthew 28: 19 (“Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit”) and 2 Corinthians 13: 13 (“The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with all of you”). Both these verses have become deeply rooted in the Christian consciousness, the former on account of its baptismal associations and the latter through the common use of the formula in Christian prayer and devotion. Yet these two verses, taken together or in isolation, can hardly be thought of as constituting a doctrine of the Trinity.

However, the biblical foundations of the doctrine do not lie exclusively in these two verses but in the overall pattern of divine activity to which the New Testament bears witness. The Father is revealed in Christ through the Spirit. There is the closest of connections between the activities of Father, Son, and Spirit in the New Testament writings. Time after time, New Testament passages link together these three elements as part of a greater whole. The totality of God's saving presence and power can only, it would seem, be expressed by involving all three elements (e.g., see 1 Corinthians 12: 4–6; 2 Corinthians 1: 21–2; Galatians 4: 6; Ephesians 2: 20–2; 2 Thessalonians 2: 13–14; Titus 3: 4–6; 1 Peter 1: 2).

The same trinitarian pattern is anticipated in the Old Testament. Three major “personifications” of God can be discerned within its pages, which naturally lead on to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. These are:

1. Wisdom. This personification of God is especially evident in the wisdom literature, such as Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. The attribute of divine wisdom is here treated as if it were a person (hence the idea of “personification”), with an existence apart from, yet dependent upon, God. Wisdom (who is always treated as female, incidentally) is portrayed as active in creation, fashioning the world in her imprint (see Job 28; Proverbs 1: 20–3, 9: 1–6; Ecclesiastes 2: 12–17).
2. The Word of God. Here, the idea of God's speech or discourse is treated as an entity with an existence independent of God yet originating with God. The Word of God is portrayed as going forth into the world to confront men and women with the will and purpose of God, bringing guidance, judgment, and salvation (see Psalms 119: 89, 147: 15–20; Isaiah 55: 10–11).
3. The Spirit of God. The Old Testament uses the phrase “the Spirit of God” to refer to God's presence and power within the creation. The Spirit is portrayed as being present in the expected Messiah (Isaiah 42: 1–3), and as being the agent of a new creation which will arise when the old order has finally passed away (Ezekiel 36: 26, 37: 1–14).

These three “hypostasizations” of God (to use a Greek-origin word in place of the more mainstream English “personification”) do not amount to a doctrine of the Trinity in the strict sense of the term. Rather, they point to a pattern of divine activity and presence in and through creation, in which God is both immanent and transcendent. A purely unitarian conception of God was ultimately inadequate to contain this dynamic understanding of God, expressed in the doctrine of the Trinity.

The doctrine of the Trinity can be regarded as the outcome of a process of sustained and critical reflection on the pattern of divine activity revealed in Scripture and continued in Christian experience. This is not to say that Scripture contains or expresses an explicit doctrine of the Trinity; rather, Scripture bears witness to a God who demands to be understood in a trinitarian manner. We shall explore the evolution of the doctrine and its distinctive vocabulary in what follows.

The Historical Development of the Doctrine

The starting point for Christian reflections on the Trinity is, as we have seen, the New Testament witness to the presence and activity of God in Christ and through the Spirit. For Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202), writing in the late second century, the whole process of salvation, from its beginning to its end, bore witness to the action of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Although Irenaeus did not use the vocabulary of later writers – such as “person” – he did make use of a term which would feature prominently in future discussion of the Trinity: “the economy of salvation.” The term “economy” needs clarification. The Greek word oikonomia basically means “the way in which one’s affairs are ordered” (the relationship to the modern sense of the word “economy” should be clear). For Irenaeus, “the economy of salvation” meant “the way in which God has ordered the salvation of humanity in history.”

At the time, Irenaeus was under considerable pressure from Gnostic critics, who argued that the creator God was quite distinct from (and inferior to) the redeemer God (see pp. 110, 196). Marcion of Sinope (c.85–160) expressed this Gnostic idea in the following form: the Old Testament God is a creator God, and totally different from the redeemer God of the New Testament. As a result, the Old Testament should be shunned by Christians, who should concentrate their attention upon the New Testament. Irenaeus vigorously rejected this idea. He insisted that the entire process of salvation, from the first moment of creation to the last moment of history, was the work of one and the same God. There was a single economy of salvation, in which the one God – who was both creator and redeemer – was at work to redeem the creation.

In his Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, Irenaeus insisted upon the distinct yet related roles of Father, Son, and Spirit within the economy of salvation. He affirmed his faith in God the Father uncreated, who is uncontained, invisible, one God, creator of the universe; this is the first article of our faith. [...] And the Word of God, the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, [...] who, in the fullness of time, in order to gather all things to himself, he became a human being amongst human beings, capable of being seen and touched, to destroy death, bring life, and restore fellowship between God and humanity. And the Holy Spirit [...] who, in the fullness of time, was poured out in a new way on our human nature in order to renew humanity throughout the entire world in the sight of God.

This passage brings out clearly the idea of an economic Trinity – that is to say, an understanding of the nature of the Godhead in which each person is responsible for an aspect of the economy of salvation. Irenaeus tends to speak simply of “God” or “Father,” “Word” or “Son,” and “Spirit” or Wisdom,” often using the image of the Son and Spirit as the “two hands” of God. “The one God made and ordered all things by his Word and Wisdom.” Far from being a rather pointless piece of theological speculation, the doctrine of the Trinity is grounded directly in the complex human experience of redemption in Christ, and is concerned with the explanation of this experience.

Neither the developed trinitarian vocabulary nor the specific concepts developed by Christian theologians to express the Christian vision of God are explicitly stated in the New Testament. As Athanasius (c.293–373) argued in his letters to Serapion, the theological vocabulary of the church had to be expanded beyond the vocabulary of the Bible itself in order to cope with the deeper themes implicit within the Bible, especially those relating to the Christian understanding of God and the identity of Jesus Christ. Some radical Christian writers of the sixteenth century argued that, since the doctrine was not explicitly set out in the Bible, it was not a biblical idea. Michael Servetus's On the Errors of the Trinity (1531) develops this line of argument. It is therefore important to trace the development of the doctrine as the early church realized the implications of its vision of God and sought to make explicit some of its implicit ideas, and find a suitable vocabulary to express these. We begin by considering the emergence of the vocabulary of the Trinity.

The Emergence of the Trinitarian Vocabulary

The vocabulary associated with the doctrine of the Trinity is unquestionably one of the biggest difficulties for students. The phrase “three persons, one substance” is not exactly illuminating, to say the least. However, understanding how the terms came to emerge is perhaps the most effective way of appreciating their meaning and importance.

The theologian who may be argued to have been responsible for the development of the distinctive trinitarian terminology is Tertullian (c.160–c.220). According to one analysis, Tertullian coined 509 new nouns, 284 new adjectives, and 161 new verbs in the Latin language. Happily, not all seem to have caught on. It is thus hardly surprising that a shower of new words resulted when he turned his attention to the doctrine of the Trinity. Three of these are of particular importance.

Trinitas

Tertullian invented the word “Trinity” (Trinitas), which has become a characteristic feature of Christian theology since his time. Although other possibilities had been explored, Tertullian's influence was such that this term became normative within the western church. We shall use the original Latin terms coined by Tertullian, while providing English translations and commentary.

Persona

Tertullian introduced this Latin term to translate the Greek word hypostasis, which had begun to gain acceptance in the Greek-speaking church. Scholars have debated at length over what Tertullian meant by this Latin term, which is invariably translated into English as “person” (on which see pp. 177–81). The following explanation commands a wide degree of assent and casts at least some light on the complexities of the Trinity.

The term persona literally means “a mask,” such as that worn by an actor in a Roman drama. At this time, actors wore masks to allow the audiences to understand which of the different characters in a drama they were playing. The term persona thus came to have a developed meaning, along the lines of “the role that someone is playing.” It is quite possible that Tertullian wanted his readers to understand the idea of “one substance, three persons” to mean that the one God played three distinct yet related roles in the great drama of human redemption.

Behind the plurality of roles lay a single actor. The complexity of the process of creation and redemption did not imply that there were many gods, simply that there was one God who acted in a multiplicity of manners within the “economy of salvation” (a term which will be explained in more detail in the following section).

Substantia

Tertullian introduced this term to express the idea of a fundamental unity within the Godhead, despite the inherent complexity of the revelation of God within history. “Substance” is what the three persons of the Trinity have in common. It must not be thought of as something which exists independently of the three persons; rather, it expresses their common foundational unity, despite their outward appearance of diversity.

The Emergence of Trinitarian Concepts

Tertullian did more than give the theology of the Trinity its distinctive vocabulary (as noted above); he also made significant contributions to shaping its distinctive form. God is one; nevertheless, God cannot be regarded as something or someone totally isolated from the created order. The economy of salvation demonstrates that God is active in creation. This activity is complex; on analysis, this divine action reveals both a unity and a distinctiveness. Tertullian argues that substance is what unites the three aspects of the economy of salvation; person is what distinguishes them. The three persons of the Trinity are distinct yet not divided (distincti non divisi), different yet not separate or independent of each other (discreti non separati). The complexity of the human experience of redemption is thus the result of the three persons of the Godhead acting in distinct yet coordinated manners in human history, without any loss of the total unity of the Godhead.

By the second half of the fourth century, the debate concerning the relationship of the Father and the Son gave every indication of having been decided. The recognition that Father and Son were “of one being” settled the Arian controversy and established a consensus within the church over the divinity of the Son. But further theological construction was necessary. What was the relationship of the Spirit to the Father? And to the Son? There was a growing consensus that the Spirit could not be omitted from the Godhead. The Cappadocian fathers, especially Basil of Caesarea (c.330–79), defended the divinity of the Spirit in such persuasive terms that the foundation was laid for the final element of trinitarian theology to be put in its place. The divinity and coequality of Father, Son, and Spirit had been agreed; it now remained to develop trinitarian models to allow this understanding of the Godhead to be visualized.

In general, eastern theology tended to emphasize the distinct individuality of the three persons or hypostases, and to safeguard their unity by stressing the fact that both the Son and the Spirit derived from the Father. The relationship between the persons or hypostases is ontological, grounded in what those persons are. Thus, the relationship of the Son to the Father is defined in terms of “being begotten” and “sonship.” As we shall see, Augustine moves away from this approach, preferring to treat the persons in relational terms.

The western approach, however, was more marked by its tendency to begin from the unity of God, especially in the work of revelation and redemption, and to interpret the relationships of the three persons in terms of their mutual fellowship. It is this position which is characteristic of Augustine, and which we shall explore later (see pp. 312–13).

The eastern approach might seem to suggest that the Trinity consists of three independent agents, doing quite different things. This possibility was excluded by two later developments, which are usually referred to by the terms “mutual interpenetration” (perichoresis) and “appropriation.” Although these ideas found their full development at a later stage in the development of the doctrine, they were unquestionably hinted at by both Irenaeus and Tertullian, and found more substantial expression in the writings of Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394). We may usefully consider both these ideas at this stage.

Perichoresis

This Greek term, which is often found in either a Latin (circumincessio) or English (“mutual interpenetration”) translation, came into general use in the sixth century. It refers to the manner in which the three persons of the Trinity relate to one another. The concept of perichoresis allows the individuality of the persons to be maintained while insisting that each person shares in the life of the other two. An image often used to express this idea is that of “a community of being,” in which each person, while maintaining its distinctive identity, penetrates the others and is penetrated by them.

Leonardo Boff (born 1938; see p. 119) and other theologians concerned with political theology have argued that this has important implications for Christian political thought. The mutual relationships between three coequal persons within the Godhead could provide a model both for human relationships within communities and for Christian political and social theorizing. Our attention now turns to a related idea of importance in this connection.

Appropriation

This second idea is related to perichoresis and follows on from it. The modalist heresy (see p. 308–10) argued that God could be considered as existing in different “modes of being” at different points in the economy of salvation, so that, at one point, God existed as Father and created the world; at another, God existed as Son and redeemed it. The doctrine of appropriation insists that the works of the Trinity are a unity; every person of the Trinity is involved in every outward action of the Godhead. This idea is often expressed using the Latin slogan opera trinitatis ad extra indivisa sunt (“the outward actions of the Trinity are indivisible”). Thus Father, Son, and Spirit are all involved in the work of creation, which is not to be viewed as the work of the Father alone. For example, Augustine of Hippo affirmed the overall unity of the actions of the Trinity while allowing for distinctiveness at points of detail.

There is one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. When this Trinity is known, to the extent possible in this life, it is clear that every creature – whether intellectual, animal, or physical – may be perceived to derive its existence from this same creative Trinity. It has its own form, and is subject to this most perfect order. It is not as if the Father were understood to have made one part of creation, the Son another, and the Spirit another. Rather, the Father made everything through the Son in the gift of the Holy Spirit.

Elsewhere, Augustine pointed out that the Genesis creation account speaks of God, the Word, and the Spirit (Genesis 1: 1–3), thus indicating that all three persons of the Trinity were present and active at this decisive moment in salvation history. Yet it is still appropriate to think of creation as the work of the Father. Despite the fact that all three persons of the Trinity are implicated in creation, it is properly seen as the distinctive action of the Father. Similarly, the entire Trinity is involved in the work of redemption (although, as we noted on p. 260, a number of theories of salvation, or soteriologies, ignore this trinitarian dimension of the cross and are impoverished as a result). It is, however, appropriate to speak of redemption as being the distinctive work of the Son.

Taken together, the doctrines of perichoresis and appropriation allow us to think of the Godhead as a “community of being,” in which all is shared, united, and mutually exchanged.

Rationalist Critiques of Trinitarianism: The Eclipse of the Trinity, 1700–1900

We have already noted some of the criticisms directed against the doctrine of the Trinity. One of the most significant of these came from various forms of rationalism, which held that the Trinity was logically incoherent. Yet it is important to appreciate that some Christian theologians held similar misgivings about the doctrine. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the doctrine of the Trinity appears to have receded into the background. It was, of course, taught in seminaries. Yet the doctrine was increasingly regarded as something of an apologetic liability on the one hand and as being of little constructive use on the other.

The origins of this trend lie in the radical wing of the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation. A leading theme of the Reformation was its insistence that all its doctrines and practices should be justified on the basis of the Bible. Many more radical Protestants argued that the doctrine of the Trinity was not explicitly stated in the Bible. Far from being an authentic Christian doctrine, it reflected the later speculations and elaborations of misguided theologians. Anti-trinitarianism, already evident in the late 1520s, became a hallmark of the radical Reformation in the 1550s, causing widespread concern in both Protestant and Catholic circles. For Juan de Valdés (c.1509–41) and others, the doctrine of the Trinity was simply not to be found in the Bible, nor could it be defended on its basis.

The rise of rationalism in western Europe and North America, however, created a context in which the apparent irrationality of the doctrine created serious apologetic difficulties for Christian orthodoxy. This is especially obvious in the English debates of the eighteenth century. Here, Deist critics of traditional Christianity argued that its doctrine of the Trinity lacked scriptural grounding, that it involved obvious contradictions, and especially that, as a supposed “mystery” beyond the reach of human reason, it offended reason by requiring belief in what could not be understood.

Yet the real problem was that the doctrine of the Trinity seemed to confer no particular benefits to offset its apparent irrationality. Most leading theologians of the seventeenth century seem to have held on to the doctrine of the Trinity out of respect for tradition, while privately conceding that it seemed irrational in the light of the growing emphasis upon the “reasonableness of Christianity” and that it seemed to provide little in the way of spiritual or theological benefits. The defense of the doctrine by John Tillotson (1630–94), sometime archbishop of Canterbury, amounts primarily to a reaffirmation that there are doctrines which go beyond reason without thereby contradicting reason. Yet Tillotson seems decidedly coy about precisely what insights or values the doctrine of the Trinity confers. In an era in western culture which was increasingly dominated by the Enlightenment, Christian apologists appear to have downplayed their commitment to the notion of the Trinity, presenting Christianity in theist, rather than trinitarian, terms.

All this changed in the twentieth century. The pioneering work of Karl Barth (1886–1968) in Protestant dogmatics triggered a re-evaluation of the place of the doctrine. Barth made the doctrine the structuring principle of his Christian dogmatics, establishing a firm connection between this doctrine and the actuality of revelation in history. The foundations had been laid for a major revival of the doctrine, especially as it now seemed to safeguard the distinctiveness of Christianity at a time of increased awareness of religious pluralism. Karl Rahner (1904–84), Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88), Thomas F. Torrance (1913–2007), Robert Jenson (born 1930), and Colin Gunton (1941–2003) made important contributions to the present trinitarian renaissance in theology, which shows no sign of abating.

The Problem of Visualization: Analogies of the Trinity

As noted earlier, the doctrine of the Trinity is not without its difficulties. The real difficulty for most people lies in the visualization of the Trinity. How can we make sense of such a complex and abstract idea? St. Patrick, the patron saint of Ireland, is rumored to have used a shamrock to illustrate how a single leaf could have three different elements. Gregory of Nyssa used a series of analogies in his letters to help his readers grasp the reality of the Trinity, including:

1. The analogy of a spring, fount, and stream of water. The one flows from the other and they share the same substance – water. Although different aspects of the stream of water may be distinguished, they cannot be separated.
2. The analogy of a chain. There are many links in a chain, yet to be connected to one is to be connected to all of them. In the same way, Gregory argues, someone who encounters the Holy Spirit also encounters the Father and the Son.
3. The analogy of a rainbow. Drawing on the Nicene statement that Christ is “light from light,” Gregory argues that the rainbow allows us to distinguish and appreciate the different colors of a sunbeam. There is only one beam of light, yet the colors blend seamlessly into one another.

Useful though these patristic analogies may be, they do not really solve the problem of how such a difficult and abstract notion can be visualized.

“Economic” and “Essential” Approaches to the Trinity

For classical Christian theology, Father, Son, and Spirit are not three isolated and diverging compartments of a Godhead, like three subsidiary components of an international corporation. Rather, they are differentiations within the Godhead, which become evident within the economy of salvation and the human experience of redemption and grace. The doctrine of the Trinity affirms that, beneath the surface of the complexities of the history of salvation and our experience of God, lies one God and one God only. To put it simply, Christian theologians use the term “essential Trinity” when considering who God is outside history and the term “economic Trinity” when considering what God does in history.

This distinction stems from one of the most sophisticated reflections on these themes: Karl Rahner's treatise The Trinity (1970). For Rahner, the “economic” and “essential” (or “immanent”) Trinities do not constitute two different Godheads; rather, they are two different manners of approaching the same Godhead. The “essential” or “immanent” Trinity can be regarded as an attempt to formulate the Godhead outside the limiting conditions of time and space; the “economic Trinity” is the manner in which the Trinity is made known within the “economy of salvation” – that is to say, in the historical process itself. Rahner lays down the following axiom (pp. 315–16): “The economic Trinity is the immanent Trinity, and vice versa.” In other words:

1. The God who is known in the economy of salvation corresponds to the way in which God actually is. They are the same God. God's self-communication takes on a threefold form because God is essentially threefold. God's self-revelation corresponds to God's essential nature.
2. The human experience of God's action in the economy of salvation is also experience of God's inner history and immanent life. There is only one network of divine relationships; that network exists in two distinct forms, one eternal and the other historical. One is above history; the other is shaped and conditioned by the limiting factors of history.

It will be clear that this approach (which summarized a broad consensus within Christian theology) ties up some loose ends left by the notion of “appropriation” and allows a firm link to be established between God's self-disclosure in history and God's eternal being.

Two Trinitarian Heresies

In an earlier section (p. 97) we introduced the idea of heresy, making the point that the term is best understood as an inadequate version of Christianity. In an area of theology as complex as that of the doctrine of the Trinity, it is hardly surprising that a variety of ways of approaching the subject should have developed. Nor should it be cause for surprise that some of them turned out, on closer inspection, to be seriously inadequate. The two heresies which are to be discussed in what follows are the most important for the student of theology.

Modalism: Chronological and Functional

The term “modalism” was introduced by the German historian of dogma Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930) to describe the common element of a group of trinitarian heresies, associated with Noetus and Praxeas in the late second century and Sabellius in the third. Each of these writers was concerned to safeguard the unity of the Godhead, fearing a lapse into some form of tritheism as a result of the doctrine of the Trinity. (As will become clear, this fear was often amply justified.)

This vigorous defense of the absolute unity of God (often referred to as “monarchianism,” from the Greek word monarchia, meaning “a single principle of authority”) led these writers to insist that the self-revelation of the one and only God took place in different ways at different times. The divinity of Christ and the Holy Spirit is to be explained in terms of three different ways or “modes” of divine self-revelation (hence the term “modalism”).

Although there are various forms of “modalism,” they generally work with much the same understandings of the dynamics of the Trinity:

1. The one God is revealed in the manner of creator and lawgiver. This aspect of God is referred to as “the Father.”

2. The same God is also revealed in the manner of savior, in the person of Jesus Christ. This aspect of God is referred to as “the Son.”
3. The same God is also revealed in the manner of the one who sanctifies and gives eternal life. This aspect of God is referred to as “the Spirit.”

There is thus no difference, save that of appearance and chronological location, between the three entities in question. There are three terms for the same God. This led directly to the doctrine of “patripassianism,” as noted earlier (p. 185): the Father suffers as the Son, since there is no fundamental or essential difference between the Father and the Son.

Some forms of modalism are chronological and some are functional. It is important to appreciate this distinction:

1. Chronological modalism holds that God was Father at one point in history; that God was then Son at another point; and, finally, that God was Spirit. God thus appears in different modes at different times. The classic example of this form of modalism is Sabellianism, which we will discuss in more detail below.
2. Functional modalism holds that God operates in different ways at the present moment and that the three persons of the Trinity refer to these different modes of action.

The main features of Sabellianism were set out by Epiphanius of Constantia in the late fourth century, as follows:

A certain Sabellius arose not long ago (in fact, quite recently); it is from him that the Sabellians take their name. His opinions, with a few unimportant exceptions, are the same as those of the Noetians. Most of his followers are to be found in Mesopotamia and the region of Rome. [...] Their doctrine is that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one and the same being, in the sense that three names are attached to one substance [hypostasis]. It is just like the body, soul and spirit in a human being. The body is as it were the Father; the soul is the Son; while the Spirit is to the Godhead as his spirit is to a human being. Or it is like the sun, being one substance [hypostasis], but having three manifestations [energia]: light, heat, and the orb itself. The heat [...] is analogous to the Spirit; the light to the Son; while the Father himself is represented by the essence of each substance. The Son was at one time emitted, like a ray of light; he accomplished in the world all that related to the dispensation of the gospel and the salvation of humanity, and was then taken back into heaven, as a ray is emitted by the sun and then withdrawn again into the sun. The Holy Spirit is still being sent forth into the world and into those individuals who are worthy to receive it.

From this passage, it will be clear that Sabellianism is chronological modalism. Its basic feature is the belief that the one supreme God acts in different ways at different points in history.

In contrast, functional modalism designates the general belief that the same God acts in three different manners at any given point in history. The three persons of the Trinity thus designate different aspects of the activity of the one God. A simple form of functional modalism could be set out as follows:

1. God the Father is the creator;
2. God the Son is the redeemer;
3. God the Holy Spirit is the sanctifier.

Here, the three persons of the Trinity are held to designate (or to bring about) three different actions of the one supreme God. God acts as creator (and we call this “Father”); God acts as redeemer (and we call this “Son”); God acts as sanctifier (and we call this “Holy Spirit”). The persons of the Trinity thus refer to different divine functions. The approach to the doctrine of the Trinity set out by John Macquarrie (1919–2007, p. 316) could be interpreted as a variant of this form of modalism. Some scholars also argue that Karl Barth's doctrine of the Trinity is modalist, as it can be understood to mean that God operates in multiple ways in the present. Many Barth scholars, however, dispute this.

Tritheism

If modalism represented one apparently simple (yet ultimately inadequate) solution to the dilemma posed by the Trinity, tritheism offered an equally neat way out. Tritheism invites us to imagine the Trinity as consisting of three equal, independent, and autonomous beings, each of whom is divine. Many students will regard this as an absurd idea. However, the same idea can be stated in more subtle forms. Some critics have argued that an understated form of tritheism can be found in the writings of the Cappadocian fathers – Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89), and Gregory of Nyssa. Recent scholarship, however, has called this into question.

To explore this point further, we shall consider the most important of these writings: Gregory of Nyssa's treatise to his colleague Ablabius, subtitled “that there are not three gods.” Ablabius had earlier written to Gregory, expressing concern that the formula “three persons, one substance” seemed to lead to tritheism. After all, it was easy to envisage three human persons, each sharing a common human nature. But they were still three different people, weren't they? So how could he avoid falling into tritheism when using this formula?

In replying, Gregory insists “that the word ‘Godhead’ does not signify a specific nature but an operation.” He illustrates his point by considering how the generic term “orator” affirms both shared generalities and specific particularities:

For instance, orators share the same occupation, and thus have the same name in each case – yet each of them works by himself as an orator, this one arguing in his own distinctive way, and another in his own way. Thus, since at the human level, the action of each individual sharing the same occupation can be distinguished, they are properly called “many,” since each of them is separated from the others within his own environment, according to the special character of his operation.

Gregory then applies this point to God, arguing that, while it is essential to appreciate the distinctive identities of each person of the Trinity in terms of their operations, the Godhead represents a unity in terms of the outcomes of these actions. The argument is not easy to follow and is probably best seen as pointing to the incapacity of any human model to do justice to the nature of God.

Perhaps the clearest statement of the doctrine of the Trinity to be found in the patristic period is that set out by the Eleventh Council of Toledo (675). This Council, which met in the Spanish city of Toledo and was attended by a mere 11 bishops, is widely credited with setting out the western view of the Trinity with an enviable clarity, and is regularly cited in later medieval discussions of this doctrine. In what follows, the Council explains the relationship between the words “Trinity” and “God,” and stresses the importance of the relationalities within the Godhead.

This is the way of speaking about the Holy Trinity as it has been handed down: it must not be spoken of or believed to be “threefold” [triplex], but to be “Trinity.” Nor can it properly be said that in the one God there is the Trinity; rather, the one God is the Trinity. In the relative names of the persons, the Father is related to the Son, the Son to the Father, and the Holy Spirit to both. While they are called three persons in view of their relations, we believe in one nature or substance. Although we profess three persons, we do not profess three substances, but one substance and three persons.

The Trinity: Six Classic and Contemporary Approaches

The doctrine of the Trinity, as will be clear from the material we have considered thus far, is a remarkably difficult area of Christian theology. In what follows, we shall survey six approaches, classic and modern, to this doctrine. Each of these approaches casts light on aspects of the doctrine and allows insights to be gained concerning its foundations and implications. Perhaps the most important of these classic expositions is that of Augustine, whereas in the modern period that of Karl Barth is of outstanding importance. However, the approach adopted by the Cappadocian fathers continues to be of importance, particularly within modern Greek and Russian Orthodox theology. It is therefore appropriate to begin our discussion by considering this classic approach to the Trinity, which continues to be highly influential in modern Christian thought.

Many older discussions of the Cappadocian and Augustinian approaches to the Trinity are influenced by a discussion dating from the 1880s by the French scholar Theodore de Régnon (1831–93). De Régnon drew a sharp distinction between approaches to the Trinity which emphasize the threeness of the Godhead and those which emphasize its unity. According to de Régnon, the trinitarian reflections of the Cappadocian fathers began from the threeness or plurality of divine persons, whereas Augustine began from the undifferentiated unity of the divine essence. These stereotypes are simply not helpful, and readers are recommended to avoid them if possible. The interplay of unity and plurality is more complex than this simple model allows. With this cautionary point in mind, we will turn to consider our six case studies.

The Cappadocian Fathers

As we noted earlier, the Cappadocian fathers – Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory of Nazianzus – played a pivotal role in establishing the full divinity of the Holy Spirit (pp. 282–4). This was formally endorsed by the Council of Constantinople in 381. Once this decisive theological step had been taken, the way was open to a full statement of the doctrine of the Trinity. With the recognition of the identity of substance of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the door was opened to exploring their mutual relationship within the Trinity. Once more, the Cappadocians played a decisive role in this major theological development.

The Cappadocians' approach to the Trinity is best understood as a defense of the divine unity coupled with a recognition that the one Godhead exists in three different “modes of being” or “manners of existence.” The formula which expresses this approach best is “one substance [ousia] in three persons [hypostaseis].” The one indivisible Godhead is common to all three persons of the Trinity. This one Godhead exists simultaneously in three different “modes of being” – Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This is not modalism (see pp. 308–10) but is rather a principled attempt to maintain the divine unity while recognizing the complexity of divine presence and action.

One of the most distinctive features of this approach to the Trinity is the priority assigned to the Father. Although the Cappadocian writers stress that they do not accept that either the Son or the Spirit is subordinate to the Father, they nevertheless explicitly state that the Father is to be regarded as the source or fountainhead of the Trinity. The being of the Father is imparted to both the Son and the Spirit, although in different ways: the Son is “begotten” of the Father and the Spirit “proceeds” from the Father. Gregory of Nyssa thus writes of “the one person of the Father, from whom the Son is begotten and the Spirit proceeds.” Similarly, Gregory of Nyssa argues that the ultimate ground of unity within the Trinity is the Father: “the three have one nature (that is, God), the ground of their unity being the Father.”

So how can the one substance be present in three persons? The Cappadocians answered this question by appealing to the relationship between a universal and its particulars – for example, humanity and individual human beings. Thus, Basil of Caesarea argues that the one substance within the Trinity can be conceived as analogous to a universal, and the three persons to particulars. A common human nature, shared by all people, does not mean that all human beings are identical; it means that they retain their individuality, even though they share this common nature. Thus, each of the three persons within the Trinity has a distinctive characteristic.

According to Basil of Caesarea, the distinctive characteristics of each of the persons are as follows: the Father is distinguished by fatherhood, the Son by sonship, and the Spirit by the ability to sanctify. For Gregory of Nazianzus, the Father is distinguished by “being ingenerate” (agennesia, a difficult word which conveys the idea of “not being begotten” or “not deriving from any other source”), the Son by “being generate” (genesis, which could also be translated as “being begotten” or “deriving one’s origins from someone else”), and the Spirit by “being sent” or “proceeding.” The difficulty with this analogy, noted earlier (p. 310), is that it does seem to hint at tritheism, even though a more rigorous analysis shows that this is not actually the case.

Augustine takes up many elements of the emerging consensus on the Trinity – for example, in his vigorous rejection of any form of subordinationism (that is, treating the Son and the Spirit as inferior to the Father within the Godhead). Augustine insists that the action of the entire Trinity is to be discerned behind the actions of each of its persons. Thus, humanity is not merely created in the image of God; it is created in the image of the Trinity. An important distinction is drawn between the eternal Godhead of the Son and the Spirit, and their place in the economy of salvation. Although the Son and the Spirit may appear to be posterior to the Father, this judgment only applies to their role within the process of salvation. Although the Son and the Spirit may appear to be subordinate to the Father in history, in eternity all are coequal. This is an important anticipation of the later distinction (see p. 308) between the essential Trinity, grounded in God's eternal nature, and the economic Trinity, grounded in God's self-revelation within history.

Perhaps the most distinctive element of Augustine's approach to the Trinity concerns his understanding of the person and place of the Holy Spirit; we have already considered specific aspects of this during our discussion of the filioque controversy (see pp. 287–90). However, there is more that needs to be said about Augustine's conception of the Spirit as the love that unites the Father and the Son.

Augustine identifies the Son with “wisdom” (sapientia) and the Spirit with “love” (caritas). He concedes that he has no explicit biblical grounds for this identification; nevertheless, he regards it as a reasonable inference from the biblical material. The Spirit “makes us dwell in God, and God in us.” This explicit identification of the Spirit as the basis of union between God and believers is important, as it points to Augustine's idea of the Spirit as the giver of community. The Spirit is the divine gift which binds us to God.

There must therefore, Augustine argues, be a corresponding relationship within the Trinity itself. The gift must reflect the nature of the giver. God already exists in the kind of relationship to which God wishes to bring us. And, just as the Spirit is the bond of union between God and the believer, so the Spirit exercises a comparable role within the Trinity, binding the persons together. “The Holy Spirit [...] makes us dwell in God, and God in us. But that is the effect of love. So the Holy Spirit is God who is love.”

This argument is supplemented by a general analysis of the importance of love within the Christian life. Augustine, basing his ideas loosely on 1 Corinthians 13: 13 (“These three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love”), argues along the following lines:

1. God's greatest gift is love.
2. God's greatest gift is the Holy Spirit.
3. Therefore the Holy Spirit is love.

This style of analysis has been criticized for its obvious weaknesses, not least in leading to a curiously depersonalized notion of the Spirit. The Spirit appears as a sort of glue, binding Father and Son together and binding both to believers. The idea of “being bound to God” is a central feature of Augustine's spirituality, and it is perhaps inevitable that this concern appears prominently in his discussion of the Trinity.

One of the most distinctive features of Augustine's approach to the Trinity is his development of “psychological analogies.” The reasoning which lies behind the appeal to the human mind in this respect can be summarized as follows. It is not unreasonable to expect that, in creating the world, God has left a characteristic imprint upon that creation. Augustine uses the Latin term vestigium – which means “footprint” – to refer to this divine imprint on the created order. But where is that imprint (vestigium) to be found? It is reasonable to expect that God would plant this distinctive imprint upon the height of his creation. The Genesis creation accounts allow us to conclude that humanity is the height of God's creation. Therefore, Augustine argues, we should look to humanity in our search for the image of God.

So what is the height of humanity? On the basis of some Neoplatonic assumptions, Augustine argues that the human mind is to be regarded as the apex of humanity. It is therefore to the individual human mind that the theologian should turn, in looking for “traces of the Trinity” (vestigia Trinitatis) in creation. The radical individualism of this approach, coupled with its obvious intellectualism, means that he chooses to find the Trinity in the inner mental world of individuals, rather than – for example – in personal relationships (an approach favored by medieval writers, such as Richard of St. Victor).

Furthermore, a first reading of On the Trinity suggests that Augustine seems to regard the inner workings of the human mind as telling us as much about God as about the economy of salvation. Although Augustine stresses the limited value of such analogies, he himself appears to make more use of them than this critical appraisal would warrant.

Augustine discerns a triadic structure to human thought and argues that this structure of thought is grounded in the being of God. He points to the triad of memory, understanding, and will as an analogy of God as Trinity. Just as there are three faculties in the human mind which are not ultimately totally separate and independent entities, so there can also be three “persons” in God.

There are some obvious difficulties here, possibly even some fatal weaknesses. As has often been pointed out, the human mind cannot be reduced to three entities in quite this neat and simplistic manner. In the end, however, it must be pointed out that Augustine's appeal to such “psychological analogies” is actually illustrative rather than constitutive. The three are intended to be visual aids (although visual aids that are grounded in the doctrine of creation) to insights that may be obtained from Scripture and from reflection on the economy of salvation. Augustine's doctrine of the Trinity is not ultimately grounded in his analysis of the human mind but in his reading of Scripture, especially of the fourth gospel.

The most significant restatements of the doctrine of the Trinity within the western tradition date from the twentieth century, which saw a revival of Trinitarian theology. We shall consider four quite distinct approaches, beginning with that of Karl Barth.

Barth sets the doctrine of the Trinity at the opening of his Church Dogmatics (1936–69). This simple observation is important, for he totally inverts the position in which it was fixed by F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834). For Schleiermacher, the Trinity is perhaps the last word which can be said about God; for Barth, it is the word which must be spoken before revelation is even a possibility. It is thus placed at the opening of the Church Dogmatics because its subject matter is what makes dogmatics possible in the first place. The doctrine of the Trinity undergirds and guarantees the actuality of divine revelation to sinful humanity. It is an “explanatory confirmation,” as Barth puts it, of revelation. It is an exegesis of the fact of revelation.

“God reveals himself. He reveals himself through himself. He reveals himself.” With these words (which I have found to be impossible to translate into inclusive language), Barth sets up the revelational framework which leads to the formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity. Deus dixit! (“God has spoken!”) – in the event of revelation, and it is the task of theology to inquire concerning what this revelation presupposes and implies. For Barth, the doctrine of the Trinity has an explanatory and regulatory function which encompasses theology in its entirety. The Trinity is not a puzzle to be solved but an explanatory framework which sets theology in its proper perspective and thus offers solutions to its problems and riddles. For Barth, theology is a process of “thinking afterward” about what is contained in God's self-revelation. We have to “inquire carefully into the relation between our knowing of God, and God himself in his being and nature.”

With such statements, Barth sets up the context of the doctrine of the Trinity: given that God's self-revelation has taken place, what must be true of God for this to have happened? What does the actuality of revelation have to tell us about the being of God? Barth's starting point for his discussion of the Trinity is not a doctrine or an idea but the actuality of God's speaking and God's being heard. For how can God be heard when sinful humanity is incapable of hearing the Word of God?

The above paragraph is simply a paraphrase of sections of the first half-volume of Barth's Church Dogmatics, entitled "The Doctrine of the Word of God." There is an enormous amount said in this, and it requires unpacking. Two core themes in Barth's analysis need to be carefully noted:

1. Sinful humanity is fundamentally incapable of hearing the Word of God.
2. Nevertheless, sinful humanity has heard the Word of God, in that this Word makes its sinfulness known to it.

The very fact that revelation takes place thus requires explanation. For Barth, this implies that humanity is passive in the process of reception; the process of revelation is, from its beginning to its end, subject to the sovereignty of God as Lord. For revelation to be revelation, God must be capable of effecting self-revelation to sinful humanity, despite humanity's sinfulness.

Once this paradox has been appreciated, the general structure of Barth's doctrine of the Trinity can be followed. In revelation, Barth argues, God must be as shown in the divine self-revelation. There must be a direct correspondence between the revealer and the revelation. If "God reveals himself as Lord" (a characteristically Barthian assertion), God must be Lord "antecedently in himself." Revelation is the reiteration in time of what God actually is in eternity. There is thus a direct correspondence between:

1. the revealing God;
2. the self-revelation of God.

To put this in the language of trinitarian theology, the Father is revealed in the Son.

So what about the Spirit? Here we come to what is perhaps the most difficult aspect of Barth's doctrine of the Trinity: the idea of "revealedness" (German: Offenbarsein). To explore this concept, we will have to use an illustration not used by Barth himself. Imagine two individuals, walking outside Jerusalem on a spring day around the year AD 30. They see three men being crucified and pause to watch. The first points to the central figure and says, "There is a common criminal being executed." The second, pointing to the same man, replies, "There is the Son of God dying for me." To say that Jesus of Nazareth is the self-revelation of God will not do in itself; there must be some means by which Jesus of Nazareth is recognized as the self-revelation of God. It is this recognition of revelation as revelation that lies at the heart of Barth's idea of "revealedness."

So how is this critical insight achieved? Barth is quite clear: sinful humanity is not capable of reaching this insight unaided. Barth is not prepared to allow humanity any positive role in the interpretation of revelation, believing that this is to make divine revelation subordinate to human theories of knowledge. (As we saw on p. 146, he has been heavily criticized for this, even by those, such as Emil Brunner, who might otherwise be sympathetic to his aims.) The interpretation of revelation as revelation must itself be the work of God – more accurately, the work of the Spirit. Humanity does not become capable of hearing the word of the Lord (capax verbi Domini) and then hear this word; both this hearing and this capacity to hear are given in the one act by the Spirit.

All this might seem to suggest that Barth is really some kind of modalist, treating the different moments of revelation as different "modes of being" of the same God. It must be conceded immediately that there are those who charge him with precisely this deficiency. Nevertheless, more considered reflection perhaps moves us away from this judgment, although other criticisms can certainly be made. For example, the Spirit fares rather badly in Barth's exposition, which in this respect can be argued to mirror weaknesses in the western tradition as a whole. However, whatever its weaknesses may be, Barth's discussion of the Trinity is generally regarded as having reinstated the importance of the doctrine after a period of sustained neglect within dogmatic theology. That process of reinstatement has been further consolidated through the work of the Jesuit theologian Karl Rahner, to which we now turn.

Like Barth, Karl Rahner is widely seen as having played a decisive role in the renewal of trinitarian theology in the twentieth century. Rahner's particular contribution to the development of modern trinitarian theology is generally agreed to be his analysis of the relationship between the “economic” and the “immanent” Trinity (see p. 308). The basic distinction here is between the manner in which God is known through revelation in history and the manner in which God exists internally. The “economic Trinity” can be thought of as the way in which we experience the diversity and unity of God's self-disclosure in history, and the “immanent Trinity” as God's diversity and unity as it is in God. Rahner's axiom concerning their relationship, which is widely quoted in modern theology, takes the following form: “The ‘economic’ Trinity is the ‘immanent’ Trinity, and the ‘immanent’ Trinity is the ‘economic’ Trinity.” In other words, the way God is revealed and experienced in history corresponds to the way God actually is.

Rahner's approach to the Trinity is a powerful corrective to certain tendencies in older Catholic trinitarian theology, especially the tendency to focus on the "immanent Trinity" in such a way as to marginalize both human experience of God and the biblical witness to salvation. For Rahner, the "economic" Trinity relates to the "biblical statements concerning the economy of salvation and its threefold structure." Rahner's axiom allows him to affirm that the entire work of salvation is the work of one divine person. Despite the complexity of the mystery of salvation, a single divine person can be discerned as its source, origin, and goal. Behind the diversity of the process of salvation there is to be discerned only one God.

This fundamental principle of the unity of the economy of salvation can be traced back to Irenaeus (especially in his polemic against the Gnostics; see pp. 122–4), who argued that two divine beings could be distinguished within the economy of salvation. Rahner therefore insists that the proper starting point of trinitarian discussion is our experience of salvation history, and its biblical expression. The “mystery of salvation” happens first; then we move on to formulate doctrines concerning it. This “previous knowledge of the economic Trinity, derived from salvation history and the Bible” is the starting point for the process of systematic reflection. The “immanent Trinity” can therefore be thought of as a “systematic conception of the economic Trinity.”

Rahner therefore argues that the process of theological reflection which leads to the doctrine of the immanent Trinity has its starting point in our experience and knowledge of salvation in history. The complexity of that salvation history is ultimately grounded in the divine nature itself. In other words, although we experience diversity and unity within the economy of salvation, that diversity and unity correspond to the way God actually is. Rahner expresses this point as follows:

The differentiation of the self-communication of God in history (of truth) and spirit (of love) must belong to God “in himself,” or otherwise this difference, which undoubtedly exists, would do away with God's self-communication. For these modalities and their differentiation either are in God himself (although we first experience them from our point of view) or they exist only in us.

In other words, “Father,” “Son,” and “Holy Spirit” are not simply human ways of making sense of the diversity of our experience of the mystery of salvation. Nor are they roles which God somehow temporarily assumes for the purpose of entering into our history. Rather, they correspond to the way God actually is. The same God who appears as a Trinity is a Trinity. The way in which God is known in self-revelation corresponds to the way God is internally.

John Macquarrie (1919–2007)

John Macquarrie, a Scottish theologian with roots in the Presbyterian tradition, approached the doctrine of the Trinity from an existentialist perspective. In his Principles of Christian Theology (1966), Macquarrie argued that what he calls “Holy Being” has “let itself be known in the Christian community of faith under the Trinitarian symbolism of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, one God.” For Macquarrie, the doctrine of the Trinity “safeguards a dynamic as opposed to a static understanding of God.” But how can a dynamic God simultaneously be stable? Macquarrie's reflections on this tension lead him to conclude that “if God had not revealed himself as triune, we should have been compelled to think of him in some such way.” He explores the dynamic conception of God within the Christian tradition in the following manner:

1. The Father is to be understood as “primordial Being.” By this, we are meant to understand “the ultimate act or energy of letting-be, the condition that there should be anything whatsoever, the source not only of whatever is but of all possibilities of being.”
2. The Son is to be conceived as “expressive Being.” “Primordial Being,” Macquarrie argues, needs to express itself in the world of beings, which it does by “flowing out through expressive Being.” In adopting this approach, Macquarrie picks up the idea of the Son being the Word or Logos, the agent of the Father in the creation of the world. He explicitly relates this form of being to Jesus Christ: “Christians believe that the Father's Being finds expression above all in the finite being of Jesus.”
3. The Holy Spirit is to be understood as “unitive Being,” in that it “is the function of the Spirit to maintain, strengthen and, where need be, restore the unity of Being with the beings.” The task of the Spirit is to promote new and higher levels of unity between God and the world (between “Being” and “beings,” to use Macquarrie's terms); it leads the beings back up into a new and richer unity with Being which let them be in the first place.

It will be clear that Macquarrie's approach is genuinely helpful in linking the doctrine of the Trinity with the existential situation of humanity. Yet its weakness is also evident, in that there appears to be a certain artificiality involved in the assignment of existential functions to the persons of the Trinity. One wonders what would have happened if the Trinity had happened to have four members; perhaps Macquarrie would have devised a fourth category of being to deal with this situation? But this is a weakness of existential approaches in general rather than of this approach in particular.

It is also interesting to consider whether Macquarrie's approach can be considered to be a form of modalism – specifically, the functional modalism which we noted earlier (p. 309). Macquarrie appears to argue that the doctrine of the Trinity is to be viewed as the revelation of three modes of being within God. Yet these three persons “are not just three stages in the community's experience, or three temporal phases in God's self-manifestation, but belong together in the ‘substance’ of the Godhead, that is to say, in Being.”

Macquarrie's approach illuminates both the strengths and weaknesses of the existentialist approach to theology. Broadly speaking, these may be stated as follows:

1. The strength of the approach is that it gives a powerful additional dimension to Christian theology, by indicating the ways in which this theology may be correlated with the structures of human existence.
2. The weakness of the approach is that, although capable of existential enhancement of existing Christian doctrines, it is less valuable in establishing those doctrines in the first place.

Robert Jenson (Born 1930)

Writing from a Lutheran perspective, but deeply versed in the Reformed tradition, the contemporary American theologian Robert Jenson has provided a fresh and creative restatement of the traditional doctrine of the Trinity. In many ways, it is appropriate to regard Jenson as providing a development of Barth's position, with its characteristic emphasis upon the need to remain faithful to God's self-revelation. Jenson's The Triune Identity: God According to the Gospel (1982) provides a fundamental reference point for discussion of the doctrine in a period which has seen fresh interest develop in this hitherto neglected matter.

Jenson argues that "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" is the proper name for the God whom Christians know in and through Jesus Christ. It is imperative, he argues, that God should have a proper name.

"Trinitarian discourse is Christianity's effort to identify the God who has claimed us. The doctrine of the Trinity comprises both a proper name, 'Father, Son and Holy Spirit' [...] and an elaborate development and analysis of corresponding identifying descriptions." Jenson points out that ancient Israel was set in a polytheistic context, in which the term "god" conveyed relatively little information. It was necessary to name the god in question. A similar situation was confronted by the writers of the New Testament, who were obliged to identify the god at the heart of their faith, and distinguish this god from the many other gods worshiped and acknowledged in the region, especially in Asia Minor.

The doctrine of the Trinity thus identifies and names the Christian God – but identifies and names this God in a manner consistent with the biblical witness. It is not a name which we have chosen; it is a name which has been chosen for us, and which we are authorized to use. In this way, Jensen defends the priority of God's self-revelation against human constructions of concepts of divinity. "The gospel identifies its God thus: God is the one who raised Israel's Jesus from the dead. The whole task of theology can be described as the unpacking of this sentence in various ways. One of these produces the church's trinitarian language and thought." We noted in an earlier section (pp. 182–4) the manner in which the early church tended accidentally to confuse distinctively Christian ideas about God with those deriving from the Hellenistic context into which it expanded. The doctrine of the Trinity, Jenson affirms, is and was a necessary defense mechanism against such developments. It allows the church to discover the distinctiveness of its creed and avoid becoming absorbed by rival conceptions of God.

However, the church could not ignore its intellectual context. If, on the one hand, its task was to defend the Christian notion of God against rival conceptions of divinity, another of its tasks was to provide “a metaphysical analysis of the gospel's triune identification of God.” In other words, it was obliged to use the philosophical categories of its day to explain precisely what Christians believed about their God, and how this distinguished them from alternatives. Paradoxically, the attempt to distinguish Christianity from Hellenism led to the introduction of Hellenistic categories into trinitarian discourse.

The doctrine of the Trinity thus centers on the recognition that God is named by Scripture, and within the witness of the church. Within the Hebraic tradition, God is identified by historical events. Jenson notes how many Old Testament texts identify God with reference to divine acts in history – such as the liberation of Israel from its captivity in Egypt. The same pattern is evident in the New Testament: God is recognized to be identified with reference to historical events, supremely the resurrection of Jesus Christ. God comes to be identified in relation to Jesus Christ. But who is God? Which god are we talking about? The God who raised Christ from the dead. As Jenson puts it, “the emergence of a semantic pattern in which the uses of ‘God’ and ‘Jesus Christ’ are mutually determining” is of fundamental importance within the New Testament.

Jenson thus recovers a personal conception of God from metaphysical speculation. “Father, Son, and Holy Spirit” is a proper name, which we are asked to use in naming and addressing God. “Linguistic means of identification – proper names, identifying descriptions, or both – are a necessity of religion. Prayers, like other requests and praises, must be addressed.” The Trinity is thus an instrument of theological precision which forces us to be accurate in our language about the God under discussion.

Some Discussions of the Trinity in Recent Theology

The second half of the twentieth century witnessed some remarkable explorations of the doctrine of the Trinity. To give readers an idea of the fertility and creativity of this outburst of reflection, based on a new confidence in the doctrine after the collapse of Enlightenment rationalism and a growing awareness of its implications, we shall report briefly on four recent discussions. We open, however, by considering a classic question: where should the doctrine of the Trinity be located in a systematic theology?

F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) on the Dogmatic Location of the Trinity

The doctrine of the Trinity has traditionally been placed toward the beginning of works of Christian theology, not least on account of the influence of the creeds of Christendom upon such works. The creeds open with a declaration of faith in God; it therefore seemed natural to most theologians to follow this pattern, placing any discussion about the doctrine of God at the opening of their works. Thus, Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), perhaps the finest representative of this classic tradition of doing theology, considered it only natural to begin his Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”) with a discussion of the doctrine of God in general, immediately followed by his account of the doctrine of the Trinity in particular. However, it must be stressed that this pattern is not the only one which could be adopted. To illustrate this point, we shall consider the location of the discussion of the doctrine of God in F. D. E. Schleiermacher's The Christian Faith (1821–2, revised edition 1830–1).

As we noted earlier (pp. 67, 131–4), Schleiermacher's approach to theology is to begin with the common human experience of “a feeling of absolute dependence,” which is then interpreted in a Christian sense as “a feeling of absolute dependence upon God.” As a result of a long process of inference from this feeling of dependence, Schleiermacher finally reaches the doctrine of the Trinity. This doctrine is placed right at the end of the work, as an appendix. For some, such as Karl Barth, this demonstrates that Schleiermacher regarded the Trinity as a mere appendix to his theology; for others, it suggests that it was the last word that the theologian could utter concerning God – in other words, the climax of the entire theological enterprise.

It is clear that Schleiermacher had misgivings about the notion of the Trinity, partly because he believed that the main emphasis of the Christian faith lay elsewhere (especially in the doctrine of the Church and the person of Jesus of Nazareth). Other critics have suggested that Schleiermacher could not see how the Trinity could fit into the immediate self-consciousness of the believer. Kinder critics point out that Schleiermacher clearly regarded it as important to defend the idea of the Trinity in a strongly rationalist context, trying to show that it encapsulated some important insights which would otherwise be lost.

Jürgen Moltmann (Born 1926) on the Social Trinity

In The Trinity and the Kingdom of God (1980), Jürgen Moltmann attempts to liberate the Christian doctrine of God from the confines both of the ancient Greek metaphysics of substance and of the modern metaphysics of transcendental subjectivity. Moltmann's Trinity and the Kingdom of God is of particular importance on account of its fully social doctrine of the Trinity. Moltmann's social doctrine of the Trinity emphasizes the relative independence of the person and work of the Holy Spirit in its community with the Father and the Son. Developing this in a way that might cause anxiety to some, Moltmann emphasizes that there is no fixed order in the Trinity. The unity of God is the unity of persons in relationship, as expressed in the Cappadocian doctrine of perichoresis. On this reading of the concept, Moltmann argues that “the trinitarian persons form their own unity by themselves in the circulation of the divine life.” This conception of God is radically opposed, Moltmann insists, to any “monotheistic” or “monarchical” doctrine of God which would reduce the real subjectivity of the three persons. Of particular interest is Moltmann's use of this notion to develop a fundamentally theological understanding of human society.

“The trinity is our social program.” For Jürgen Moltmann, the doctrine of the Trinity is to be understood to provide a vision of God as a union of three divine persons or distinct but related subjects. This specific understanding of God as a mutually loving, interacting, and sustaining society allows Christian theology to develop a theory of society. “The social doctrine of the Trinity is in a position to overcome both monotheism in the concept of God and individualism in the doctrine of man, and to develop a social personalism and personalist socialism.” For Moltmann, the Christian concept of the Trinity provides “the exemplar of true human community, first in the church and also in society.” Excessively authoritarian and centralized notions of government rest upon a conception of God which stresses God's “monarchy,” whereas a trinitarian doctrine of God stresses the divine unity and community. Moltmann therefore sees the social view of the Trinity as having both a theological and a social function: theologically, it offers a penetrating critique of a false idea of God; socially, it articulates a notion of God as a social being, capable of functioning as a proper paradigm for society as a whole.

The triune God is reflected only in a united and uniting community of Christians without domination and subjection and a united and uniting humanity without class rule and without dictatorial oppression. That is the world in which people are defined by their social relationships and not by their power or their property. That is the world in which human beings have all things in common and share everything with one another except their personal qualities.

Social approaches to the Trinity – such as that here developed by Moltmann – are open to criticism on several grounds. The most important of these is that social models of the Trinity tend to project contemporary ideals and society or human relationships onto God, and then regard the doctrine of the Trinity as somehow validating these ideals. There is, critics such as Karen Kilby argue, a risk of projection – that is to say, reading existing human social values or norms into the Trinity and then reading them out of the Trinity, so that “what is projected onto God is immediately reflected back onto the world.” To put this concern simply, “social” approaches to the Trinity run the risk of echoing prevailing social norms and assumptions. Their supporters (such as Leonardo Boff), however, argue that they provide a robust theological basis for an understanding of both church and society.

Eberhard Jüngel (Born 1934) on the Trinity and Metaphysics

In his difficult book God as the Mystery of the World (1977), Eberhard Jüngel set out to explore how it is possible to speak of God in a responsible manner in a world in which people live etsi Deus non daretur (“as if God were not given”). For Jüngel, the problem is clear, as is its solution. The problem is that much western theology has allowed its thinking about God to be shaped, not by the specifics of the Christian revelation, but by ideas of God which derive from secular metaphysics.

Jüngel's concern is that a specific type of metaphysics – which he traces back to Descartes (1596–1650) – makes certain imperialistic claims which, if conceded, lead to the erosion of an authentically Christian conception of God. Thus, Jüngel notes how critics of Christianity such as J. G. Fichte (1762–1814), Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72), and Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900) derive their understanding of God from the metaphysical tradition, not from the Christian tradition. Jüngel then correctly points out that the major forms of atheism which arose in western culture during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries are not rejections of the Christian god but are rather reactions against inadequate metaphysical notions of God. Making much the same point, Alasdair MacIntyre (born 1929) remarks that “the God in whom the nineteenth and twentieth centuries came to disbelieve had been invented only in the seventeenth century.”

Jüngel's solution is to urge Christianity to rediscover its own distinctive vision of God which is fundamentally trinitarian in nature. He stresses that God identifies himself with the crucified Christ, so that faith recognizes the crucified human being Jesus of Nazareth as identical to God. Like Moltmann, Jüngel makes the cross the center of the trinitarian history of God. A proper interpretation of the crucifixion of Christ leads decisively away from the philosophical monotheism of classical theism toward the distinctively and authentically Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Jüngel moves on from here to develop a trinitarian “theology of the cross.” The cross reveals a differentiation between Father and Son. (A similar point had been made earlier by Jürgen Moltmann, who disentangled the different manners in which Father and Son experience suffering and drew out their trinitarian implications.) The resurrection, however, affirms the unity of Father and Son, God and Jesus. How is this to be interpreted? Jüngel maps out a road which leads to the doctrine of the Trinity with his declaration that “the knowledge of the identification of God with Jesus necessitates the distinction of God from God.” The New Testament itself makes such a distinction, when it distinguishes God the Son (the crucified Jesus) from God the Father (who raised him from the dead). The Father and Son are held together by the bond of unity, the Holy Spirit.

This “self-differentiation” within God, recognized on the basis of the relationship between the resurrection and crucifixion of Christ, constitutes the basis of the doctrine of the Trinity. It also forms the basis of the Christian critique of both monotheism and metaphysical theism, as well as the types of atheism that correspond to these forms of theism. From this, it is clear that Jüngel sees the church's task of engaging with the world as depending on a recovery of its own distinctive understanding of God and breaking free from its recent imprisonment to secular metaphysics. The doctrine of the Trinity, he argues, is central to this development.

Catherine Mowry LaCugna (1952–97) on the Trinity and Salvation

One of the most impressive studies of the theological foundations and application of the doctrine of the Trinity to appear in recent decades is Catherine Mowry LaCugna's God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life (1991). This richly textured work examines why the doctrine of the Trinity has been so problematic for the western church, and proposes some solutions. In this work, LaCugna, formerly Nancy Reeves Dreux Professor of Theology at the University of Notre Dame, develops the central insight that western trinitarianism has tended to ignore God's revelation in the economy of salvation, preferring to engage in speculative reflection on the divine nature itself.

LaCugna traces this development back to the tension – which was highly significant at the time of the Council of Nicea (325) – between theologia and oikonomia, between the so-called immanent or essential Trinity and the economic Trinity. The term oikonomia, which we identify with the economic Trinity, refers to the self-communication of God in Jesus Christ and in the Holy Spirit's activity in the history of salvation. All that we know about God is a result of this activity. Theologia, or our knowledge of the eternal being of God, should in principle be coextensive with what we have learned from revelation in the divine economy of salvation. We have no access to the immanent life of God that goes beyond what has been revealed. Yet a refusal to accept this, LaCugna argues, has led to the Christian tradition adopting concepts of God which are shaped by Greek philosophy, rather than by the biblical revelation, to define our understanding of the Trinity. As noted above, a similar line of criticism was developed earlier in Eberhard Jüngel's God as the Mystery of the World (1977). LaCugna seeks to correct this problem by returning to the economy of salvation as definitive for our understanding of the nature of God.

This involves her in a creative yet critical engagement with Karl Rahner. LaCugna reworks Rahner's statements concerning the economic and essential Trinity as follows: “theology is inseparable from soteriology, and vice versa.” By arguing for a recovery of the identification of theologia with oikonomia, LaCugna believes that theology is liberated from the pointless and potentially misleading distinction between God's inner and outer aspects. This “return to the biblical and pre-Nicene pattern of thought” reaffirms that there is only one trinitarian life of God, which embraces and enfolds the entire scope of salvation history. Far from being a speculative doctrine, it stands revealed as the expression of the heart of the Christian faith.

The doctrine of the Trinity, properly understood, is the affirmation of God's intimate communion with us through Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. As such, it is an eminently practical doctrine with far-reaching consequences for Christian life. By presenting the doctrine of the Trinity in a way that is more at home with the concrete language and images of the Bible, creeds, and the liturgy, the Christian doctrine of God can be reconnected with other areas of theology, as well as to ethics, spirituality, and the life of the church.

Sarah Coakley (Born 1951) on Feminism and the Trinity

The traditional language of trinitarian faith speaks of “Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.” At least on the face of it, this seems to give priority to male imagery concerning God. One of the agendas of feminist theology is to identify and rectify power imbalances arising from gender issues. In 1973, the noted feminist writer Mary Daly (1928–2010) pointed out that “when God becomes male, the male becomes God.” Daly's own work was severely critical of the use of male language and imagery in every area of theology, particularly the traditional representation of the Trinity, which she famously depicted as a “boys' club” or “men's association.”

So what are the alternatives? How can feminism develop this issue positively? A number of approaches have emerged. Some feminist writers have argued that the traditional language should be replaced with non-gendered alternatives: “Father, Son, and Holy Spirit” might thus become “Creator, Redeemer, and Sustainer.” A second group has noted how, at certain points in the Christian tradition, the Holy Spirit has been spoken of in feminine terms – for example, noting the use of the feminine pronoun for the Holy Spirit in Syriac sources (see pp. 293–4). Others have emphasized that the Trinity concerns relationality, rather than hierarchy, and have interpreted the doctrine in terms of fostering Christian intimacy with God rather than in terms of the power structures it might be held to legitimate.

Some of the most interesting and constructive reflections on this question stem from the Anglican writer Sarah Coakley. Coakley's reflections on the Trinity are informed by a deep knowledge of the development of Christian doctrine, particularly during the patristic age. Noting the tendency of male theological discourse to be rationalist and passionless, lacking any erotic element, Coakley offers a strategy for recovering a fuller appreciation of a trinitarian theology, partly through a critical reading of its sources.

Coakley's approach is developed in a number of works, most notably her Powers and Submissions: Spirituality, Philosophy and Gender (2002). However, the roots of her approach are most conveniently studied from an essay entitled “Batter My Heart” – the opening words of a famous poem by John Donne (1572–1631), exploring the trinitarian dynamic. There are three basic elements (or “axioms”) in Coakley's approach. She begins by noting that any conception of the Trinity is heavily freighted with notions of power.

Visions of God as the Trinity see the inner trinitarian relationships (that is, the relations between Father, Son and Spirit) as a prototype or charter for right relationships tout court. Thus [...] if “the personal is the political” (to use the familiar feminist slogan), then no doctrine of the Trinity, however construed, can be wholly devoid of political, spiritual and sexual implications. [...] The task of a Christian feminist, then, will be to ferret out those connections and implications, and, if necessary, criticize and redirect them.

Having established this idea, Coakley then points to the practice and experience of Christian prayer as creating a framework for understanding this doctrine. “An analysis of Christian prayer, especially relatively wordless contemplative or charismatic prayer, provides an acutely revealing matrix for explaining the origins of trinitarian reflection.” In particular, Coakley notes the role of the Holy Spirit in fostering the intimate prayerful relationship between the believer and God. Where some feminists affirmed the femininity of the Spirit as a means of subverting a masculine Trinity, Coakley points instead to the role of the Spirit in relation to prophecy and ecstasy, seeing this as undermining rationalist construals of the Christian faith, and God in particular.

Finally, Coakley notes how “the Church had politico-ecclesiastical reasons for preventing this vision of God, with its prioritization and highlighting of the Spirit, from getting too close to center stage.” Coakley’s reading of historical theology leads her to note that some patristic writers, such as Origen (c.185–c.254) and Gregory of Nyssa, developed approaches to the reading of Scripture which were, at points, far removed from the cool, safe rationalism that became characteristic of the later church.

So how does this have any bearing on feminism? Coakley’s approach is subtle and does not take the form of a direct confrontation with the traditional trinitarian language and imagery. Rather, she offers a framework for redirecting and reconceiving it. The practice of prayer, she argues, shifts the emphasis away from rationalist approaches to God toward those which emphasize embodied experience. Prayer is a trinitarian and empowering activity, in which the believer is caught up in a relationship with the living reality of a trinitarian God, not an abstract and undifferentiated divine entity. Although Coakley avoids crude gender generalizations, it is clear that she associates male theologizing with “rationalism” or logos and female theologizing with “relationality” or eros. Her approach offers a framework for both a critical reading of historical theology and reconceiving the trinitarian vision in more holistic ways.

The Trinitarian Renaissance: Some Examples

The foundations for a revival of interest in the Trinity were laid by Karl Barth and others in the period before the Second World War. Since then, there has been a remarkable surge of interest in developing trinitarian approaches across the life and thought of the church. Catholics, Orthodox, and Protestants alike have been involved in the exploration of the trinitarian geography of faith. The importance of this development was emphasized by the British theologian Colin Gunton, one of the most important advocates of the “promise of trinitarian theology”:

Because God is triune, we must respond to him in a particular way, or rather set of ways, corresponding to the richness of his being. [...] In turn, that means that everything looks – and, indeed, is – different in the life of the Trinity.

In bringing this chapter to a close, it therefore seemed appropriate to note some of these approaches, partly to emphasize the interconnectedness of theological themes and partly to note their importance and utility for the life and witness of the church. The philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) declared the doctrine of the Trinity to have “no practical relevance,” finding it questionable in terms of both its rationality and its usefulness. On both counts, contemporary theologians seem to disagree.

What follows is simply a noting of some important recent developments, rather than a detailed exploration of their themes. We begin by considering recent developments in the theology of mission.

A Trinitarian Theology of Mission

There has always been a recognition that the doctrine of the Trinity has a role to play in the outreach of the church. However, much Christian theology of mission prior to the Second World War was Christocentric, focusing on the identity and claims of Jesus of Nazareth. For example, the theologian and missionary bishop Lesslie Newbigin (1909–98) was initially strongly Christocentric in his thinking about the nature of the church, and its mission. His One Body, One Gospel, One World (1958) can be seen as a classic statement of this position. However, deeper reflection on the doctrine of the Trinity, and further experience of church life in India, began to bring about changes in Newbigin's thinking. His Relevance of Trinitarian Doctrine for Today's Mission (1963) can be seen as a landmark in his thinking, marking a transition to a more rigorously trinitarian understanding of mission.

Others also made important contributions to this development. In the early 1960s, the Dutch missiologist Johannes Hoekendijk (1912–75) set out some fundamental objections to the prevailing themes of the Christocentric basis and ecclesiocentric agency of mission. In their place, he offered a theology of mission with a trinitarian basis, seeing the world – rather than the church – as the primary location of God's work. Prevailing approaches to missionary theology, he argued, were “bound to go astray” since they revolved around an “illegitimate center” – the church rather than the world. This radical reorientation would come about, he argued, by the development of a consistent and thorough trinitarian theology which recognized God's work in the world ahead of explicit missionary activity.

Such a shift of thinking was evident at the 1966 Geneva Conference on Church and Society, which adopted a trinitarian basis for its work: “We start with the basic assumption that the triune God is the Lord of his world and at work within it, and that the Church's task is to point to his acts, to respond to his demands, and to call mankind to this faith and obedience.”

These developments require much fuller statement for an appreciation of their significance to an understanding of Christian mission. Yet it is clear that a new awareness of the intellectual richness of a trinitarian vision of reality was of no small importance in creating and sustaining this approach to mission. Trinitarian missiology is presently a very significant and productive paradigm for the mission of the church. These approaches are, however, not without their difficulties or critics. While Newbigin is clearly supportive of the trinitarian revival that is taking place within western theology, he nevertheless expresses concern at points. Might this emphasis on the Trinity lead to a dilution of such critically important notions as the “universal lordship of Christ”? Might a new framework displace, rather than energize, traditional approaches to mission? This debate is likely to continue.

A Trinitarian Theology of Worship

It is clear that there is a link between the way in which Christians worship and the way in which they think. Worship – or “doxology” – and theology are increasingly being seen as two sides of the same coin. Since the close of the twentieth century, much attention has been paid to the theology of worship, almost entirely on the basis of a trinitarian foundation. The origins of this trend are often traced to Geoffrey Wainwright's Doxology (1984), which argued that the only way of making sense of Christian worship was to approach it from a trinitarian perspective. Christians worship the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit. Wainwright worked through the implications of this insight, demonstrating the importance of the doctrine of the Trinity in making sense of worship but also showing how the doctrine could enhance the Christian experience of worship.

Similar ideas were developed by others. James Torrance (1923–2003) noted how many Christians tended to worship God in an essentially Unitarian manner, as if worship were simply a human activity directed toward God. In his Worship, Community and the Triune God of Grace (1996), Torrance explored the difference that a trinitarian framework made to worship, most notably through the mediation of Christ and the enablement of the Holy Spirit.

A trinitarian geography of worship is now deeply embedded in theologies of worship, and, at a more popular level, works written to enable Christians to enhance their experience of worship. However, in other respects, awareness of the trinitarian dimensions of worship is, if anything, in decline. A survey conducted by Asbury Seminary found that, of the 72 worship songs most used between 1989 and 2004, none explicitly referred to the Trinity or the triune nature of God, and only three of the songs explicitly referred to, or named, all three persons of the Trinity. The contrast with more traditional hymns is striking.

A Trinitarian Theology of Atonement

The theology of atonement is concerned with making sense of the death of Christ. The framework of many modern accounts of the atonement was shaped by Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109) in the eleventh century; Anselm developed an approach based on Christ making satisfaction to God (pp. 259–61). This approach has been criticized, from a trinitarian perspective, by Colin Gunton. In his Actuality of Atonement (1989), Gunton argues that Anselm's theory presents the atonement as a transaction between God the Father and God the Son. Christ bears the penalty of sin on behalf of sinful humanity, and makes satisfaction to the Father. Gunton argued that this is a bipolar approach which ignores the fundamental themes of a trinitarian theology. Gunton argues that a trinitarian approach to the atonement interprets Christ's atoning sacrifice as an eternal activity within the divine life in which the Father and the Son reciprocally give themselves to each other and to the world. Gunton is adamant that trinitarian considerations cannot be added on later to existing theologies of the atonement; they need to be presupposed and explored from the outset.

Gunton's approach was developed further by the Swiss theologian Georg Pfleiderer (born 1960), who argues for an integrative theory of atonement which incorporates the plurality of biblical models, images, and ideas. Making wise use of the rich range of metaphors employed in articulating the atonement, Pfleiderer argues for a trinitarian framework which both coherently contains and effectively exhibits these metaphors. Thus, atonement as victory is correlated with the work of the Father; atonement as justice with that of the Son; and atonement as sacrifice with that of the Holy Spirit.

A Trinitarian Ecclesiology

The resurgence of trinitarian thinking that was such a distinctive feature of late twentieth-century theology is clearly having an impact on ecclesiology. Traditionally, the church has been described as the “body of Christ” and is often identified in essentially Christological terms. For example, the first-century writer Ignatius of Antioch (c.35–c.110) declared that “where Christ is, there is also the catholic church.” However, since the Second World War, there has been a growing tendency to conceive the church in terms of the Trinity. The Orthodox theologian George Dragas (born 1944), for example, places particular emphasis on the trinitarian foundation of ecclesial identity:

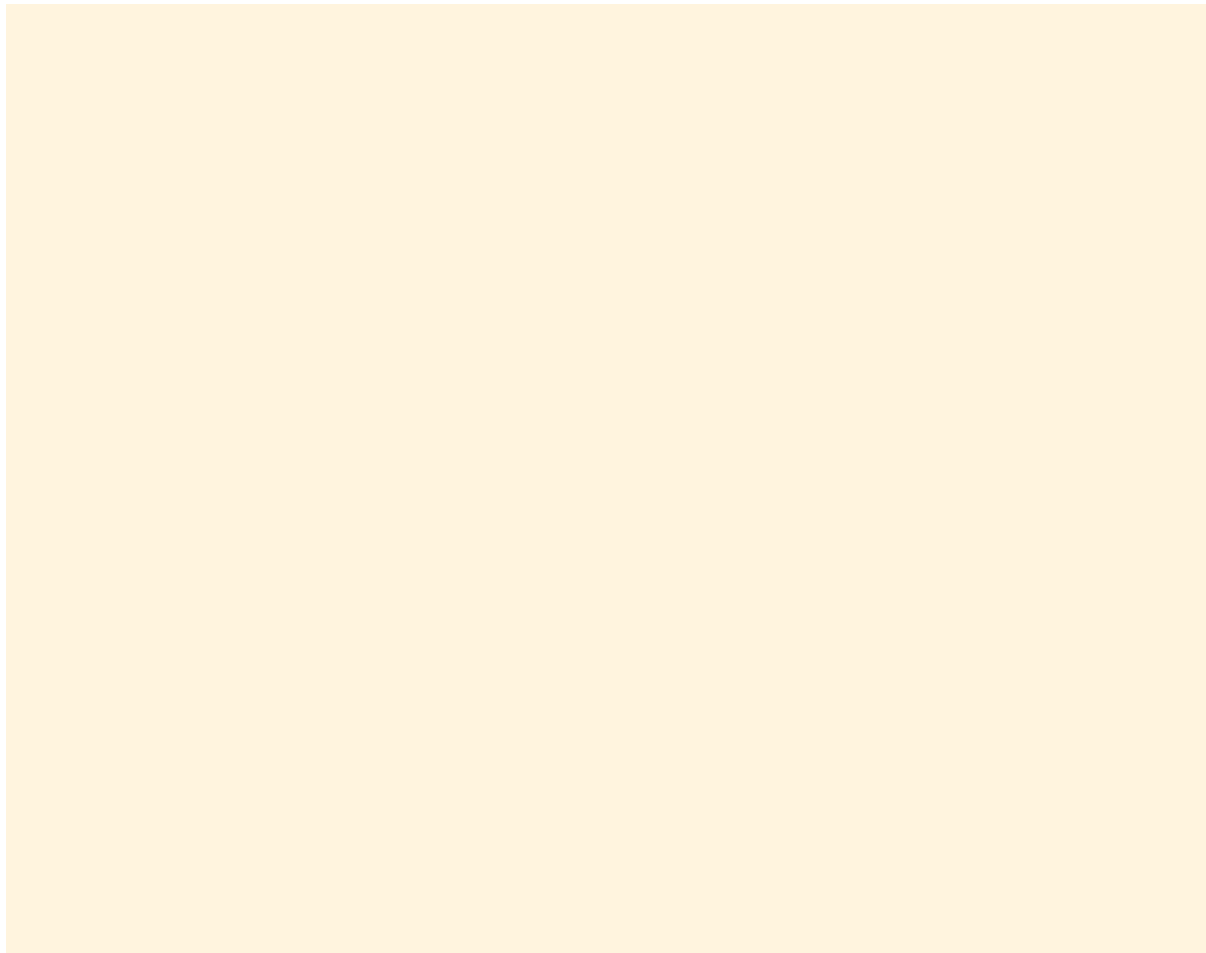

The nature of the Church is to be understood as the Church of the Triune God. The Holy Trinity is the ultimate basis and source of the Church's existence and, as such, the Church is in the image and likeness of God. This being in the image of the blessed Trinity constitutes the mode of the Church's existence, which, in fact, reveals her nature.

Such approaches are also found echoed in Protestant thinking. The Croatian theologian Miroslav Volf (born 1956) developed a similar approach in his After Our Likeness: The Church in the Image of the Trinity (1998). For Volf, a trinitarian approach to the identity and mission of the church demands prior engagement with the doctrine of the Trinity. Volf thus distinguishes his own Protestant position from that of Catholicism and Orthodoxy by offering critiques of the approaches to the Trinity set out by Joseph Ratzinger (now Benedict XVI, born 1927) and John Zizioulas (born 1931). According to Volf, Ratzinger and Zizioulas, who emphasize the unity of the Trinity, tend to see local congregations as inferior to the church as a whole. In Volf's view, the Trinity is to be seen as a community of equals, pointing to the ecclesiological conclusion that local congregations have a valued place in the life of the church as a whole.

Other instances could easily be cited of ways in which a trinitarian framework has been found to be illuminating and constructive in recent years. For example, it has been used to develop coherent and defensible approaches to other religions – as in Raimon Panikkar's trinitarian account of religious experience (Trinity and the Religious Experience of Man, 1973), Mark Heim's trinitarian theology of multiple religious ends (The Depth of the Riches, 1999), Gavin D'Costa's trinitarian theology of religions (The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity, 2000), and Amos Yong's pneumatological theology of religions (Discerning the Spirit(s), 2000). Each demands full exploration in its own right; collectively, these works point compellingly toward the intellectual possibilities opened up by a trinitarian framework. We shall consider some of these later in this work, as part of our reflections on Christian approaches to other religions, in Chapter 17.

Having now completed our reflections on the Christian doctrine of God, we may turn to consider the Christian understanding of human nature and divine grace.

Questions for Chapter 13

1. Many theologians prefer to speak of “Creator, Redeemer, and Sustainer” rather than the traditional “Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.” What is gained by this approach? And what difficulties does it raise?
2. Why did the twentieth century witness a renewal of interest in the doctrine of the Trinity?
3. How could you reconcile these two statements: “God is a person”; “God is three persons”?
4. Is the Trinity a doctrine about God or about Jesus Christ?
5. Summarize the doctrine of the Trinity found in the writings of either Augustine of Hippo or Karl Barth.
6. Identify some ways in which the doctrine of the Trinity has been developed in recent theological discussions.

HUMAN NATURE, SIN, AND GRACE

In Chapter 11 we considered the foundations of the Christian doctrine of salvation, paying particular attention to the basis and nature of salvation. A series of issues relating to salvation remain to be addressed: what must human beings do in order to share in the salvation which is made known and made available through Christ's death upon the cross? The issues which this question raises are traditionally discussed under the general heading of “the doctrine of grace,” which embraces an understanding of human nature and sin as well as the role of God in salvation. There is the closest of connections within the Christian tradition between the doctrine of salvation, on the one hand, and that of grace, on the other. We have already explored some aspects of these doctrines in earlier discussions; it is now time to explore them at greater length individually.

The Place of Humanity Within Creation: Early Reflections

The Christian tradition, basing itself largely upon the accounts of creation found in the book of Genesis, has insisted that humanity is the height of God's creation, set over and above the animal kingdom. The theological justification of this rests largely upon the doctrine of creation in the image of God, to which we now turn.

The Image of God

A text of central importance to a Christian understanding of human nature is Genesis 1: 27, which speaks of humanity being made in God's image and likeness – an idea which is often expressed with reference to the Latin phrase imago Dei. What does this affirmation mean? Jewish and Christian theologians have interpreted this passage in significantly different ways, especially during the first five Christian centuries. The Jewish interpretation of humanity's creation in the image of God tended to avoid any suggestion that this established a direct correlation with God, perhaps reflecting a fear of some form of anthropomorphism ensuing. Some Jewish exegetes argued that God created humanity in the image of the angels, interpreting the context of Genesis 1: 27 to imply that God's words were addressed to an angelic audience. Others argued that the text was to be interpreted as implying that humanity was created according to some image that was specific to it, thus distinguishing humanity from the remainder of creation. Christian theologians, however, saw no difficulty in interpreting this passage as proposing a direct link between the creator and humanity, as the height of the creation.

Especially during the early patristic period, a distinction was drawn between the two phrases “image of God” and “likeness of God.” For Tertullian (c.160–c.220), humanity retained the image of God after sinning; it could only be restored to the likeness of God through the renewing activity of the Holy Spirit:

[In baptism] death is abolished by the washing away of sins: for the removal of guilt also removes the penalty. Thus humanity is restored to God into “his likeness,” for he had originally been “in his image.” The state of being “in the image of God” relates to his form; “in the likeness” refers to his eternity: for humanity receives back that Spirit of God which at the beginning was received from God's inbreathing, but which was afterwards lost through falling away.

Origen (c.185–c.254) adopted a related approach, arguing that the term “image of God” referred to humanity after the Fall, whereas the term “likeness of God” referred to human nature after its perfection at the final consummation:

And God said, “Let us make man in our image and likeness” (Genesis 1: 26). He then adds: “In the image of God he made him” (Genesis 1: 27), and is silent about the likeness. This indicates that in his first creation man received the dignity of the image of God, but the fulfillment of the likeness is reserved for the final consummation. [...] The possibility of perfection given to him at the beginning by the dignity of the image, and then in the end, through the fulfillment of his works, should bring to perfect consummation the likeness of God.

A second approach found during the patristic period interpreted the “image of God” in terms of human reason. The “image of God” is understood to be the human rational faculty, which here mirrors the wisdom of God. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) argued that this faculty distinguishes humanity from the animal kingdom: “We ought therefore to cultivate in ourselves the faculty through which we are superior to the beasts, and to reshape it in some way. [...] So let us therefore use our intelligence [...] to judge our behavior.” Augustine does not use this theological premise to justify the human exploitation of animals, as has sometimes been suggested. Augustine's point is that the central distinctive element of human nature is its God-given ability to relate to God. Although human reason has been corrupted by the Fall, it may be renewed by grace: “For after original sin, humanity is renewed in the knowledge of God according to the image of its creator.”

The fact that humanity is created in the image of God is widely regarded as establishing the original uprightness and dignity of human nature. This idea was developed in a political direction by Lactantius (c.250–c.325) during the early fourth century. In his Divine Institutions (c.304–11), Lactantius argued that being created in the image of God established the common identity and dignity of all human beings, leading directly to a series of political doctrines concerning human rights and responsibilities:

I have spoken about what is due to God; now I shall speak about what is due to other people, although what is due to people still equally relates to God, since humanity is the image of God. [...] The strongest bond which unites us is humanity. Anyone who breaks it is a criminal and a parricide. Now it was from the one human being that God created us all, so that we are all of the same blood, with the result that the greatest crime is to hate humanity or do them harm. That is why we are forbidden to develop or to encourage hatred. So if we are the work of the same God, what else are we but brothers and sisters? The bond which unites our souls is therefore stronger than that which unites our bodies.

The doctrine of creation in the image of God was also seen as being directly related to the doctrine of redemption. Redemption involved bringing the image of God to its fulfillment, in a perfect relationship with God, culminating in immortality. Several patristic writers emphasized the state of blessedness enjoyed by Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden. For example, Athanasius (c.293–373) taught that God created human beings in the “image of God,” thus endowing humanity with a capacity which was granted to no other creature – that of being able to relate to and partake in the life of God. This fellowship with the Logos is seen at its most perfect in Eden, when Adam enjoyed a perfect relationship with God.

An important question must be raised at this point: do both men and women bear this image of God? Most biblical interpreters of the early church regarded it as obvious that both both men and women were bearers of the divine image. However, Augustine of Hippo found himself challenged by some words of Paul in the New Testament, which pointed to men as the primary bearers of the image and women as secondary or indirect bearers: “a man ought not to have his head veiled, since he is the image and reflection of God; but woman is the reflection of man” (1 Corinthians 11: 7).

Augustine insisted that God “did not exclude woman from being understood as the image of God” but found himself unable to allow that women bore this image in quite the same way as men. The following passage from Augustine's On the Trinity is often cited in this context:

The woman together with her husband is the image of God, so that the whole substance is one image. But when she is assigned as a help-mate, a function that pertains to her alone, then she is not the image of God; but as far as the man is concerned, he is by himself alone the image of God, just as fully and completely as when he and the woman are joined together into one.

What does Augustine mean here? The passage could be interpreted to mean that women participate in the image of God as human beings, not specifically as women; it could also be read to imply that a woman bears the image of God indirectly, as a result of her relationship with a man.

The Concept of Sin

For the Cappadocian fathers, the fact that Adam was created in the image of God meant that he was free from all normal weaknesses and disabilities which subsequently afflicted human nature – such as death. Cyril of Jerusalem (c.313–86) emphasized that there was no need for Adam or Eve to fall from this state of grace. It took place as a result of their decision to turn away from God to the material world. As a result, the image of God in human nature has been defaced and disfigured. Since all of humanity traces its origins to Adam and Eve, he argued, it follows that all humanity shares in this defacement of the image of God.

It should, however, be noted that the Greek patristic writers do not speak of a “Fall” or express such a “Fall” in terms of a doctrine of original sin, such as that which would later be associated with Augustine of Hippo. Most Greek writers insisted that sin arises from an abuse of the human free will. Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89) and Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394) both taught that infants are born without sin, an idea which stands in contrast with Augustine's doctrine of the universal sinfulness of fallen humanity. John Chrysostom

(c.347–407), commenting on Paul's assertion that many were made sinners through the disobedience of Adam (Romans 5: 19), interprets the passage to mean that all are made liable to punishment and death. The idea of transmitted guilt, a central feature of Augustine's later doctrine of original sin, is generally thought to be conspicuously absent from the Greek patristic tradition.

Nevertheless, at least some aspects of Augustine's notion of original sin can be detected within the eastern Christian tradition. The Oxford patristic scholar J. N. D. Kelly (1909–97) identified three areas in which at least traces of a notion of “original sin” can be discerned in the Greek patristic tradition.

1. All humanity is understood to be involved, in some manner, in the disobedience of Adam. A strong sense of the mystical unity of all humanity with Adam can be discerned within the writings of this period. All of humanity is somehow wounded by Adam's disobedience.
2. The fall of Adam is understood to affect the human moral nature. All human moral weaknesses, including lust and greed, can be put down to Adam's sin.
3. Adam's sin is often represented as being transmitted, in some undefined manner, to his posterity. Gregory of Nyssa speaks of a predisposition to sin within human nature, which can be put down, at least in part, to the sin of Adam.

It was, however, during the Pelagian debate, to which we now turn, that these issues were first discussed at length.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430) and the Pelagian Controversy

The Pelagian controversy, which erupted in the early fifth century, brought a cluster of questions concerning human nature, sin, and grace into sharp focus. Up to this point, there had been relatively little controversy within the church over human nature. The Pelagian controversy changed that, and ensured that the issues associated with human nature were placed firmly on the agenda of the western church.

The controversy centered primarily upon two individuals: Augustine and Pelagius (c.354–c.420). The controversy is complex, at both the historical and the theological level, and, given its impact upon western Christian theology, needs to be discussed at some length. It is important to appreciate that “Pelagianism” is best regarded as an amalgam of the ideas of several writers working in Rome in the final years of the fourth century – primarily Pelagius himself, but also Caelestius, and Rufinus of Syria. “Pelagianism” certainly included some ideas and emphases deriving from Pelagius; yet other ideas linked with the movement owe their origins to others. For example, Pelagianism's views on mortality and the transmission of sin appear to owe more to Caelestius and Rufinus than to Pelagius himself. For this reason, it is probably best to think of “Pelagianism” as a movement based on a synthesis of the ideas of these three thinkers, rather than as representing the ideas of Pelagius himself.

We shall summarize the main points of the controversy by considering four basic theological themes: the “freedom of the will,” the nature of sin, the nature of grace, and the basis of salvation.

The “Freedom of the Will”

For Augustine, the total sovereignty of God and genuine human responsibility and freedom must be upheld at one and the same time, if justice is to be done to the richness and complexity of the biblical statements on the matter. In his own lifetime, Augustine was obliged to deal with two heresies which he believed had simplified and compromised the Christian faith. Manicheism was a form of fatalism (to which Augustine himself was initially attracted) which upheld the total sovereignty of God but denied human freedom, while Pelagianism upheld the total freedom of the human will while denying the sovereignty of God. Before developing these points, it is necessary to make some observations concerning the term “free will.”

The term “free will” (the traditional translation of the Latin liberum arbitrium) is not biblical but was introduced into western Christianity by the second-century theologian Tertullian. (Tertullian's gift for coining new theological terms was noted earlier; see p. 304.)

Augustine retained the term but attempted to restore a more Pauline meaning to it by emphasizing the limitations placed upon human free will by sin. Augustine's basic ideas can be summarized as follows. First, natural human freedom is affirmed: human beings do not do things as a matter of necessity but as a matter of freedom. Second, human free will has been weakened and incapacitated – but not eliminated or destroyed – through sin. In order for that free will to be restored and healed, it requires the operation of divine grace. Free will really does exist; it is, however, distorted, compromised, and weakened by sin.

In order to explain this point, Augustine deployed the analogy of a pair of scales with two balance pans. One balance pan represents good and the other evil. If the pans were properly balanced, the arguments in favor of doing good or doing evil could be weighed, and a proper conclusion drawn. The human free will thus weighs up the arguments in favor of doing good and evil, and acts accordingly.

But what, asked Augustine, if the balance pans were loaded? What would happen if someone were to place several heavy weights in the balance pan on the side of evil? The scales would still work, but they would now be biased toward making an evil decision. Augustine argued that this is what has happened to humanity through sin. The human free will has become biased toward evil. It really exists, and really can make decisions – just as the loaded scales still work. But, instead of giving a balanced judgment, a serious bias exists toward evil.

For Pelagius and his followers (such as Julian of Eclanum, c.386–c.455), however, humanity possessed total freedom of the will and was totally responsible for its own sins. Human nature was essentially free and well created, and was not compromised or incapacitated by some mysterious weakness. According to Pelagius, any imperfection in humanity would reflect negatively upon the goodness of God. For God to intervene in any direct way to influence human decisions was equivalent to compromising human integrity. Going back to the analogy of the scales, the Pelagians argued that human free will was like a pair of balance pans in perfect equilibrium and not subject to any bias whatsoever. There was no need for divine grace in the sense understood by Augustine (although Pelagius did have a quite distinct concept of grace, as we shall see later).

In 413, Pelagius wrote a lengthy letter to the Roman noblewoman Demetrias (fl.413–40), who had recently decided to turn her back on wealth in order to become a nun. In this letter, Pelagius set out his views on human free will, and their consequences. God has made humanity and knows precisely what it is capable of doing. All the commands given by God to humanity are capable of being obeyed, and are meant to be obeyed. It is no excuse to argue that human frailty prevents these commands from being fulfilled. God has made human nature and only demands of it what it can endure.

[Instead of regarding God's commands as a privilege] we cry out at God and say, "This is too hard! This is too difficult! We cannot do it! We are only human, and hindered by the weakness of the flesh!" What blind madness! What blatant presumption! By doing this, we accuse the God of knowledge of a twofold ignorance – ignorance of God's own creation and of God's own commands. It would be as if, forgetting the weakness of humanity – which, after all, is God's own creation! – God had laid upon us commands which we were unable to bear.

Pelagius thus makes the somewhat uncompromising assertion that "since perfection is possible for humanity, it is obligatory."

The Nature of Sin

For Augustine, humanity is universally affected by sin as a consequence of the Fall. The human mind has become darkened and weakened by sin. Sin makes it impossible for the sinner to think clearly, and especially to understand higher spiritual truths and ideas. Similarly, as we have seen, the human will has been weakened (but not eliminated) by sin. For Augustine, sinners are to be considered as being seriously ill and are unable to diagnose their own illness adequately, let alone cure it. It is through the grace of God alone that humanity's illness is diagnosed (sin) and a cure made available (grace).

For Augustine, humanity has no control over its sinfulness. It is something which contaminates life from birth and dominates life thereafter. It is a state over which humans have no decisive control. Augustine understands humanity to be born with an innately sinful disposition, with an inherent bias toward acts of sinning. Sin thus causes sins: the underlying state of sinfulness causes individual acts of sin. Augustine explored this point by using three analogies to illuminate the nature of original sin: disease, power, and guilt.

1. The first analogy treats sin as analogous to some form of hereditary disease which is passed down from one generation to another. This disease weakens and incapacitates humanity and cannot be cured by human agency. Christ is the divine physician, by whose “wounds we are healed” (Isaiah 53: 5). Augustine understands salvation partly in sanative or medical terms, in that humanity is healed by the grace of God so that the mind may recognize God and the will may freely respond to the divine offer of grace.
2. The second analogy conceives sin as a power which holds humanity captive and from whose grip it is unable to break free by its own resources. The human free will is captivated by the power of sin and may only be liberated by grace. Christ is thus seen as the liberator of humanity, the source of the grace which breaks the power of sin.
3. The third analogy considers sin in essentially judicial or forensic terms – guilt – which is passed down from one generation to another. Christ thus comes to bring forgiveness and pardon.

Pelagius, however, understood the notion of sin in a very different light. The idea of a human disposition toward sin had no place in Pelagius's thought, or that of his colleagues. For Pelagius, the human power of self-improvement was not compromised. It was always possible for humans to discharge their obligations toward God and their neighbors. Failure to do so could not be excused on any grounds. Sin was to be understood as an act committed willfully against God.

Pelagianism thus seems at times to amount to a rather rigid form of moral authoritarianism – an insistence that humanity is under obligation to be sinless, and an absolute rejection of any excuse for failure. Humanity is born sinless and sins only through deliberate actions. Pelagius insisted that many Old Testament figures actually remained sinless. Only those who were morally upright could therefore be allowed to enter the church. Augustine, with his concept of fallen human nature, considered the church as being like a hospital where fallen humanity could recover and grow gradually in holiness through grace (see pp. 358–60). There are thus important parallels between Pelagianism and Donatism, in that both have strongly optimistic views of human moral capacities.

The Nature of Grace

One of Augustine's favorite biblical texts was John 15: 5: “apart from me you can do nothing.” In Augustine's view, humanity is totally dependent upon God for salvation. Augustine drew a careful and pointed distinction between the natural human faculties – given to humanity as its natural endowment – and additional and special gifts of grace. Augustine held that human nature is frail, weak, and lost and needs divine assistance and care if it is to be restored and renewed. Grace, according to Augustine, is God's generous and quite unmerited attention to humanity, by which this process of healing may begin.

The general features of Augustine's position can be seen in the following passage taken from the important anti-Pelagian writing On Nature and Grace, dating from 415:

Human nature was certainly originally created blameless and without any fault; but the human nature by which each one of us is now born of Adam requires a physician, because it is not healthy. All the good things, which it has by its conception, life, senses, and mind, it has from God, its creator and maker. But the weakness which darkens and disables these good natural qualities, as a result of which that nature needs enlightenment and healing, did not come from the blameless maker but from original sin, which was committed by free will. [...] But God, who is rich in mercy, on account of the great love with which He loved us, even when we were dead through our sins, raised us up to life with Christ, by whose grace we are saved. But this grace of Christ, without which neither infants nor grown persons can be saved, is not bestowed as a reward for merits, but is given freely [gratis], which is why it is called grace [gratia].

Note in particular the link Augustine establishes between the Latin terms gratis (“freely” or “without cost”) and gratia (“grace”).

Pelagius also wrote of divine grace, but interpreted this notion in a rather different way. “Grace” can be understood in two ways. First, grace is to be understood as the natural human faculties, which were graciously given to humanity by God. For Pelagius, these are not corrupted or incapacitated or compromised in any way. When Pelagius affirmed that humanity could, through grace, choose to be sinless, what he meant was that the natural God-given human faculties of reason and will could and should enable humanity to choose to avoid sin. As Augustine was quick to point out, this was not what the New Testament seemed to understand by the term.

Second, Pelagius understood grace to be external enlightenment or instruction graciously provided for humanity by God. God does not just demand that human beings should be “perfect,” which is a vague term. Rather, God graciously provides specific guidance as to what form of perfection is required – such as keeping the Ten Commandments and becoming like Christ. Grace thus informs humanity about what its moral duties are (otherwise, it would not know what they were); it does not, however, assist humanity in performing them, because there is no need for such assistance. Humanity is able to avoid sin through following the teaching and example of Christ.

Augustine argued that Pelagius and his followers thus improperly located “the grace of God in the law and in teaching.” The New Testament, according to Augustine, envisaged grace as divine assistance to humanity, rather than just moral guidance. For Pelagius, grace was something external and passive; for Augustine, grace was the real and redeeming presence of God in Christ within the believer.

Pelagius held that God created humanity and provided information concerning what is right and what is wrong. After that, however, God left humanity to its own resources (which were, Pelagius argued, God-given). Individuals will finally be judged according to whether they have fulfilled all their moral obligations in their totality.

For Augustine, however, humanity was created good by God and then fell away from him – and God, in an act of grace, came to rescue fallen humanity from its predicament. God assists fallen humanity by healing, enlightening, strengthening, and continually working to restore and renew the human soul. For Pelagius, humanity merely needed to be shown what to do and could then be left to achieve it unaided; for Augustine, humanity needed to be shown what to do and then gently aided at every point, if this objective was even to be approached, let alone fulfilled.

The Basis of Salvation

For Augustine, humanity is justified as an act of grace: even human good works are the result of God working within fallen human nature. Everything leading up to salvation is the free and unmerited gift of God, given out of love for sinners. Through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, Augustine argues, God gives humanity what it does not deserve (salvation) and withholds from it what it does deserve (condemnation).

Augustine's exposition of the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matthew 20: 1–16) is of considerable importance in this respect. Pelagius argued that God rewarded each individual strictly on the basis of merit. Augustine, however, pointed out that this parable indicates that the basis of the reward given to the individual is the promise made to that individual. Augustine emphasized that the laborers did not work for equal periods in the vineyard, yet the same wage (a denarius) was given to each. The owner of the vineyard had promised to pay each individual a denarius, providing he worked from the time when he was employed to sundown – even though this meant that some worked all day and others only for an hour.

Augustine thus drew the important conclusion that the basis of the justification of sinners is the divine promise of grace. God is faithful to that promise, and thus justifies sinners. Just as the laborers who began work in the vineyard so late in the day had no claim to a full day's wages, except through the generous promise of the owner, so sinners have no claim to justification and eternal life, except through the gracious promises of God, received through faith.

For Pelagius, however, humanity is justified on the basis of its merits. The human good works which secure salvation are the result of the exercise of the totally autonomous human free will, in fulfillment of an obligation laid down by God. A failure to meet this obligation opens the individual to the threat of eternal punishment. Jesus Christ is involved in salvation only to the extent that he reveals, by his actions and teaching, exactly what God requires of the individual. If Pelagius can speak of “salvation in Christ,” it is really only in the sense of “salvation through imitating the example of Christ.”

It will thus be clear that Pelagianism and Augustinianism represent two radically different outlooks, with sharply divergent understandings of the manner in which God and humanity relate to one another. Augustinianism would eventually gain the upper hand within the western theological tradition; nevertheless, Pelagianism continued to exercise influence over many Christian writers down the ages, not least those who felt that an emphasis upon the doctrine of grace could too easily lead to a devaluation of human freedom and moral responsibility.

The Pelagian controversy clearly raised the issue of the relation of grace and merit, which was discussed at some length in the Augustinian revival of the Middle Ages. In what follows, we shall examine some of the issues which arose.

The Medieval Synthesis of the Doctrine of Grace

The repercussions of the Pelagian controversy were considerable. It forced upon the church discussion of a number of issues, especially during the medieval period, in which Augustine's legacy was subjected to a process of evaluation and development. While the modern discussion of the meaning of both terms may be said to have been initiated by Augustine, in the course of the Pelagian controversy, the medieval period saw his ideas being developed and modified. Augustine's legacy provided the frame within which the concepts of grace and merit were discussed.

The Augustinian Legacy

At its heart, the term “grace” (gratia) has a connection with the idea of “a gift.” Augustine stressed that salvation is a gift from God, rather than a reward. This immediately suggests a tension between the ideas of “grace” and “merit,” the former referring to a gift and the latter to a reward. In fact, the question is considerably more complex than this, and merits – if the pun may be excused – careful discussion. In what follows, we shall consider the medieval debate over the meaning of the terms, to illustrate some of the issues at stake and also as background material to the Reformation debates on the issues.

Augustine explored the nature of grace using several images, as noted earlier (p. 332). Two may be noted once more in the present context. First, grace is understood as a liberating force which sets human nature free from its self-incurred bondage to sin. Augustine used the term “the captive free will” (liberum arbitrium captivatum) to describe the free will which is so heavily influenced by sin, and argued that grace is able to liberate the human free will from this bias, to give the “liberated free will” (liberum arbitrium liberatum). To go back to Augustine's analogy of the pair of scales, grace removes the weights disposing the scales toward evil and allows us to recognize the full weight of the case for choosing God. Thus, Augustine was able to argue that grace, far from abolishing or compromising the human free will, actually establishes it.

Second, grace is understood as the healer of human nature. One of Augustine's favorite analogies for the church is that of a hospital, full of sick people. Christians are people who recognize that they are ill and seek the assistance of a physician, in order that they may be healed. Thus Augustine appeals to the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10: 30–4) in suggesting that human nature is like the man who was left for dead by the roadside until he was rescued and healed by the Samaritan (representing Christ as redeemer, according to Augustine). On the basis of illustrations such as these, Augustine argues that human free will is unhealthy and needs healing.

In exploring the functions of grace, Augustine developed three main notions which have had a major impact upon western theology. The three categories are as follows:

1. Prevenient grace. The Latin term preveniens literally means “going ahead” or “going before.” In speaking of “prevenient grace,” Augustine is defending his characteristic position that God's grace is active in human lives before conversion. Grace “goes ahead” of humanity, preparing the human will for conversion. Augustine stresses that grace does not become operational in a person's life only after conversion; the process leading up to that conversion is one of preparation, in which the prevenient grace of God is operative.

2. Operative grace. Augustine stresses that God effects the conversion of sinners without any assistance on their part. Conversion is a purely divine process, in which God operates upon the sinner. The term “operative grace” is used to refer to the manner in which prevenient grace does not rely upon human cooperation for its effects, in contrast with cooperative grace.
3. Cooperative grace. Having achieved the conversion of the sinner, God now collaborates with the renewed human will in achieving regeneration and growth in holiness. Having liberated the human will from its bondage to sin, God is now able to cooperate with that liberated will. Augustine uses the term “cooperative grace” to refer to the manner in which grace operates within human nature after conversion.

The Medieval Distinction Between Actual and Habitual Grace

The theologians of the early Middle Ages were generally content to regard “grace” as a shorthand term for the graciousness or liberality of God. However, the rise of university faculties of theology led to increasing pressure for systematization, which in turn led to the development of an increasingly precise and meticulous vocabulary of grace. The most important statement of the medieval understanding of the nature and purpose of grace is that of Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74). Although Aquinas treats Augustine's analysis of grace with considerable respect, it is clear that he also has considerable misgivings concerning its viability. A fundamental distinction is drawn between two different types of grace, as follows.

1. Actual grace (often referred to by the Latin slogan gratia gratis data, “grace which is freely given”). Aquinas understands this to mean a series of divine actions or influences upon human nature.
2. Habitual grace (often referred to by the Latin slogan gratia gratis faciens, “grace which makes pleasing”). Aquinas understands this to mean a created habit of grace within the human soul. This notion is difficult and requires further explanation.

Aquinas argues that there is an enormous gulf between humanity and God. God cannot establish a direct presence within human nature. Instead, an intermediate stage is established, in which the human soul is made ready for the habitation of God. This permanent alteration to the human soul is termed “a habit of grace,” where the term “habit” means “something which is permanent.” Habitual grace is thus a substance, “something supernatural in the soul.” This change in human nature is regarded by Aquinas as the basis of human justification. Something has happened to human nature which allows it to be acceptable to God. Whereas the reformers would locate the basis of justification in God's gracious favor, by which sinners are accepted in the sight of God, Aquinas argues for the need for an intermediary in the process of being accepted by God – the habit of grace, or “habitual grace.”

Aquinas's discussion of the nature of grace in the Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”) involves the exploration of the three senses in which the word grace is used in everyday life.

As used in everyday language, “grace” is commonly understood to mean three things. First, it can mean someone's love, as when it is said that a soldier has the king's favor – that is, that the king holds him in favor. Secondly, it can mean a gift which is freely given, as when it is said: “I do you this favor.” Thirdly, it can mean the response to a gift which is freely given, as when we are said to give thanks for benefits which we have received. Now the second of these depends upon the first, as someone freely bestows a gift on someone else on account of their love for them. And the third depends upon the second, since thankfulness is appropriate to gifts which are freely given. Now if “grace” is understood in either the second or third sense of the word, it will be clear that it leaves something in the one who receives it – whether it is the gift which is freely given, or the acknowledgement of that gift. [...] To say that someone has the grace of God is to say that there is something supernatural in the soul, coming forth from God.

Aquinas's argument here is based on the recognition that every sense of the word “grace” is ultimately subordinate to the notion that anyone who is “favored” in this way is changed as a result. In other words, to “have the grace of God” is to possess the favor of God in such a manner that a supernatural change comes about within the soul of the one who has thus found favor. This “change” is described using the imagery of a supernatural habit of grace – that is, a permanent change in the recipient rather than a series of transient gracious actions.

The Late Medieval Critique of Habitual Grace

The idea of “habitual grace” became the subject of considerable criticism in the later Middle Ages. During the fourteenth century, William of Ockham (c.1285–1347) used his famous “razor” to eliminate unnecessary hypotheses from every area of theology. It seemed to him that a habit of grace was totally unnecessary. God was perfectly capable of accepting a sinner directly, without the need for any intermediate stage or intermediate entity. The principle “God can do directly what could otherwise be done through intermediate causes” led Ockham to question the need for habitual grace. It seemed an unnecessary intermediary.

So persuasive was his argument that, by the end of the fifteenth century, the notion of habitual grace was widely regarded as discredited. Grace increasingly came to be understood as divine graciousness – that is, a divine attitude toward humanity, rather than a divine or quasi-divine substance within humanity. In many ways, this can be seen as laying the foundations for the Protestant Reformation's insistence that grace was, at heart, nothing more and nothing less than the “gracious favor of God” (favor Dei).

The Medieval Debate Over the Nature and Grounds of Merit

The Pelagian controversy drew attention to the question of whether salvation was a reward for good behavior or a free gift of God (see pp. 333–4). The debate indicated the importance of clarifying what the term “merit” actually meant. Once more, it was the medieval period which saw clarification of the term. By the time of Thomas Aquinas, the following points had been generally agreed.

1. There is no way in which human beings can claim salvation as a “reward” on the basis of strict justice. Salvation is an act of God's grace, in which sinners are enabled to gain something which would otherwise lie completely beyond them. Left to their own devices, human beings would be unable to achieve their own salvation. The view that humans could earn their salvation through their own achievements was rejected as Pelagianism.
2. Sinners cannot earn salvation, since there is nothing that they can achieve or perform which obliges God to reward them with faith or justification. The beginning of the Christian life is a matter of grace alone. However, although the grace of God operates on sinners to achieve their conversion, it subsequently cooperates with them to bring about their growth in holiness. And this cooperation leads to merit, by which God rewards the moral actions of believers.
3. A distinction is drawn between two kinds of merit: congruous and condign merit. Condign merit is a strict form of merit which is justified on the basis of the moral actions of the individual in question; congruous merit is a looser notion, based upon the liberality of God rather than on human deserving or achievement.

Within the context of this general consensus over the nature of merit, a debate developed during the later Middle Ages over the ultimate ground of merit, with two rival positions being distinguishable. The debate illustrates the growing influence of voluntarism in the later Middle Ages. The older position, which can be described as “intellectualist,” is represented by writers such as Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas argued for a direct proportional representation between the moral and the meritorious value of an action on the part of a believer. The divine intellect recognizes the inherent value of an action and rewards it accordingly.

In contrast, the “voluntarist” approach, represented by William of Ockham, placed the emphasis upon the divine will. God determines the meritorious value of an action, by an act of divine will. For Ockham, the intellectualist approach compromised the freedom of God, in that God was placed under an obligation to reward a moral action with a meritorious response. In defending the divine freedom, Ockham argued that God had to be free to reward a human action in any way that seemed fit. There was thus no direct link between the moral value and the meritorious value of a human action. To his critics, Ockham seemed to have snapped the connection between human and divine notions of justice and fairness – an issue to which we shall return when we consider the issue of predestination, which brings the role of the will of God into full focus.

Our attention now turns to the great controversy which engulfed the church at the time of the Reformation during the sixteenth century, centering upon the doctrine of justification by faith.

The Reformation Debates Over the Doctrine of Grace

As we have seen, the idea that Christ's work on the cross opens up a new way of existence for human beings is articulated in a number of metaphors or images, such as “salvation” and “redemption,” initially in the writings of the New Testament (especially the Pauline letters: see p. 270) and subsequently in Christian theological reflection based upon these texts. We now turn to consider a major new direction in Christian discussion of the doctrine of grace, which is associated with the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century.

From “Salvation by Grace” to “Justification by Faith”

During the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century, a fundamental shift in the vocabulary of salvation began to take place. Earlier Christian theologians – such as Augustine – had given priority to those New Testament texts that used the language of “salvation by grace” (e.g., Ephesians 2: 5). However, Martin Luther's (1483–1546) wrestling with the issue of how God was able to accept sinners led him to focus on those passages in which Paul spoke primarily of “justification by faith” (e.g., Romans 5: 1–2).

Although it can be argued that the same fundamental point is being made in both contexts, the language used to express that point is different. One of the most important influences of the Reformation was the displacement of the language of “salvation by grace” by that of “justification by faith.” It is not clear why this transition took place. The most likely explanation is that it occurred through the personal influence of Martin Luther, for whom the idea of “justification by faith” took on an especially significant role during his formative years.

The doctrine of justification came to be seen as dealing with the question of what an individual had to do in order to be saved. As contemporary sources indicate, this question came to be asked with increasing frequency as the sixteenth century dawned. The rise of humanism brought with it a new emphasis upon individual consciousness and a new awareness of human individuality. In the wake of this dawn of the individual consciousness came a new interest in the doctrine of justification – the question of how human beings, as individuals, could enter into a relationship with God. How could a sinner hope to do this? This question lay at the heart of the theological concerns of Martin Luther, and came to dominate the early phase of the Reformation. In view of the importance of the doctrine to this period, we shall consider it in some detail, beginning with Luther's discussion of the doctrine.

The Theological Breakthrough of Martin Luther (1483–1546)

In 1545, the year before he died, Luther contributed a preface to the first volume of the complete edition of his Latin writings, in which he described how he came to break with the church of his day. The preface was clearly written with the aim of introducing Luther to a readership which might not know how he had come to hold the radical reforming views linked with his name. In this “autobiographical fragment" (as it is usually known), Luther aimed to provide those readers with background information about the development of his vocation as a reformer. After dealing with some historical preliminaries, taking his narrative up to the year 1519, he turned to describe his personal difficulties with the problem of the "righteousness of God":

I had certainly wanted to understand Paul in his letter to the Romans. But what prevented me from doing so was not so much cold blood in my heart as that one phrase in the first chapter: "the righteousness of God is revealed in it" (Romans 1: 17). For I hated that phrase, "the righteousness of God," which I had been taught to understand as the righteousness by which God is righteous, and punishes unrighteous sinners. Although I lived a blameless life as a monk, I felt that I was a sinner with an uneasy conscience before God. I also could not believe that I had pleased him with my works. Far from loving that righteous God who punished sinners, I actually hated him. [...] I was in desperation to know what Paul meant in this passage. At last, as I meditated day and night on the relation of the words "the righteousness of God is revealed in it, as it is written, the righteous person shall live by faith," I began to understand that "righteousness of God" as that by which the righteous person lives by the gift of God (faith); and this sentence, "the righteousness of God is revealed," to refer to a passive righteousness, by which the merciful God justifies us by faith, as it is written, "the righteous person lives by faith." This immediately made me feel as though I had been born again, and as though I had entered through open gates into paradise itself. From that moment, I saw the whole face of Scripture in a new light. [...] And now, where I had once hated the phrase, "the righteousness of God," I began to love and extol it as the sweetest of phrases, so that this passage in Paul became the very gate of paradise to me.

What is Luther talking about in this famous passage, which vibrates with the excitement of discovery? It is obvious that his understanding of the phrase “the righteousness of God” had changed radically. But what was the nature of this change?

The basic change was fundamental. Originally, Luther regarded the precondition for justification as a human work, something which the sinner had to perform, before he or she could be justified.

Increasingly convinced, through his reading of Augustine, that this was an impossibility, Luther could only interpret the “righteousness of God” as a punishing righteousness. But, in this passage, Luther set out how he discovered a “new” meaning of the phrase – namely, a righteousness which God gives to the sinner. In other words, the precondition for divine acceptance is provided by God, who graciously gives sinners what they require if they are to be justified.

Luther's insight here is that the God of the Christian gospel is not a harsh judge who rewards individuals according to their merits but a merciful and gracious God who bestows righteousness upon sinners as a gift. The general consensus among Luther scholars is that his theology of justification underwent a decisive alteration at some point in 1515.

Luther on Justifying Faith

Central to Luther's insights was the doctrine of “justification by faith alone.” The idea of “justification” is already familiar. But what about the phrase “by faith alone”? What is the nature of justifying faith?

“The reason why some people do not understand why faith alone justifies is that they do not know what faith is.” In writing these words, Luther drew attention to the need to inquire more closely concerning that deceptively simple word “faith.” Three points relating to Luther's idea of faith may be singled out as having special importance to his doctrine of justification. Each of these points was taken up and developed by later writers, such as John Calvin (1509–64), indicating that Luther made a fundamental contribution to the development of Reformation thought at this point. Specifically:

1. Faith is not simply historical knowledge. Luther argues that a faith which is content to believe in the historical reliability of the gospels is not a faith which justifies. Sinners are perfectly capable of trusting in the historical details of the gospels, but these facts of themselves are not adequate for true Christian faith. Saving faith involves believing and trusting that Christ was born pro nobis (“for us”), born for us personally, and has accomplished for us the work of salvation.
2. Faith is to be understood as “trust” (fiducia). Faith is not merely believing that something is true; it is being prepared to act upon that belief, and relying upon it. To use an analogy: faith is not simply about believing that a ship exists – it is about stepping into it and entrusting ourselves to it (p. 84).
3. Faith unites the believer with Christ. Luther stated this principle clearly in his 1520 work The Liberty of a Christian. Faith is not assent to an abstract set of doctrines but a union between Christ and the believer. “To know Christ is to know his benefits,” wrote Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560), Luther's colleague at Wittenberg. Faith makes both Christ and his benefits – such as forgiveness, justification, and hope – available to the believer.

The doctrine of “justification by faith” thus does not mean that the sinner is justified because he or she believes, on account of that faith. This would be to treat faith as a human action or work. Luther insists that God provides everything necessary for justification, so that all that the sinner needs to do is to receive it. God is active, and humans are passive, in justification. The phrase “justification by grace through faith” brings out the meaning of the doctrine more clearly: the justification of the sinner is based upon the grace of God and is received through faith.

The doctrine of justification by faith alone is thus an affirmation that God does everything necessary for salvation. Even faith itself is a gift of God rather than a human action.

The Concept of Forensic Justification

One of the central insights of Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone is that the individual sinner is incapable of self-justification. It is God who takes the initiative in justification, providing all the resources necessary to justify that sinner. One of those resources is the "righteousness of God." In other words, the righteousness on the basis of which sinners are justified is not their own righteousness but a righteousness which is given to them by God. Augustine had made this point earlier; Luther, however, gave it a subtle new twist which led to the development of the concept of "forensic justification."

The point at issue is difficult to explain and centers on the question of the location of justifying righteousness. Both Augustine and Luther are agreed that God graciously gives sinful humans a righteousness which justifies them. But where is that righteousness located? Augustine argued that it was to be found within believers; Luther insisted that it remained outside believers. For Augustine, the righteousness in question is internal; for Luther, it is external.

For Augustine, God bestows justifying righteousness upon the sinner, in such a way that it becomes part of his or her person. As a result, this righteousness, although originating from outside the sinner, becomes part of his or her person. For Luther, the righteousness in question remains outside the sinner: it is an "alien righteousness" (iustitia aliena). God treats, or "reckons," this righteousness as if it were part of the sinner's person. In his Romans lectures of 1515–16, Luther developed the idea of the "alien righteousness of Christ" imputed – not imparted – to us by faith, as the grounds of justification. His comments on Romans 4: 7 are especially important:

Since the saints are always conscious of their sin, and seek righteousness from God in accordance with his mercy, they are always reckoned as righteous by God. Thus in their own eyes, and as a matter of fact, they are unrighteous. But God reckons them as righteous on account of their confession of their sin. In fact, they are sinners; however, they are righteous by the reckoning of a merciful God. Without knowing it they are righteous; knowing it they are unrighteous. They are sinners in fact but righteous in hope.

Believers are righteous on account of the alien righteousness of Christ which is imputed to them – that is, treated as if it were theirs through faith. Earlier, we noted that an essential element of Luther's concept of faith is that it unites the believer to Christ. Justifying faith thus allows the believer to link up with the righteousness of Christ and be justified on its basis. Christians are thus “righteous by the imputation of a merciful God.”

Through faith, the believer is clothed with the righteousness of Christ in much the same way, Luther suggests, as Ezekiel 16: 8 speaks of God covering the nakedness of sinners with a garment. For Luther, faith is the right (or righteous) relationship to God. Sin and righteousness thus coexist; believers remain sinners inwardly but are righteous extrinsically, in the sight of God. By confessing their sins in faith, believers stand in a right and righteous relationship with God. From their own perspective they are sinners, but in the perspective of God (Latin: coram Deo) they are righteous.

This approach accounts, in Luther's view, for the persistence of sin in believers, while at the same time accounting for the gradual transformation of the believer and the future elimination of that sin. Luther thus declared, in a famous phrase, that a believer is “at one and the same time righteous and a sinner” (simul iustus et peccator); righteous in hope but a sinner in fact; righteous in the sight and through the promise of God yet a sinner in reality.

These ideas were subsequently developed by Luther's follower Philip Melanchthon to give the doctrine now generally known as “forensic justification,” hinted at but not fully developed by Luther. Where Augustine held that the sinner is made righteous in justification, Melanchthon argued that justification is about the sinner being counted as righteous or pronounced to be righteous. For Augustine, “justifying righteousness” is imparted; for Melanchthon, it is imputed. For Augustine, justification and sanctification were simply different aspects of the same thing. Melanchthon drew a sharp distinction between the event of being declared righteous and the process of being made righteous, designating the former “justification” and the latter “sanctification” or “regeneration.”

According to Melanchthon, God pronounces the divine judgment – that the sinner is righteous – in the heavenly court (in foro divino). This legal approach to justification gives rise to the term “forensic justification,” from the Latin word forum (“marketplace” or “courtyard”) – the place traditionally associated with the dispensing of justice in classical Rome.

The importance of this development lies in the fact that it marked a radical break with the teaching of the western church up to that point. From the time of Augustine onward, justification had always been understood to refer to both the event of being declared righteous and the process of being made righteous. Melanchthon's concept of forensic justification diverged radically from this. As it was taken up by virtually all the major reformers subsequently, it came to mark a standard difference between the Protestant and Catholic churches from that point onward.

In addition to their differences on how the sinner was justified, there was now an additional disagreement on what the word “justification” designated in the first place. As we shall see, the Council of Trent, the Catholic church's definitive response to the Protestant challenge, reaffirmed the views of Augustine on the nature of justification and censured the views of Melanchthon.

John Calvin (1509–64) on Justification

The model of justification which would eventually gain the ascendancy in the later Reformation was formulated by Calvin in the 1540s and 1550s. Calvin defines justification as follows:

To be justified in God's sight is to be reckoned as righteous in God's judgment, and to be accepted on account of that righteousness. [...] The person who is justified by faith is someone who, apart from the righteousness of works, has taken hold of the righteousness of Christ through faith, and having been clothed with it, appears in the sight of God not as a sinner, but as a righteous person. Therefore justification is to be understood simply as the acceptance by which God receives us into his favor as righteous people. We say that it consists of the remission of sins and the imputation of the righteousness of Christ. [...] believers are not righteous in themselves, but on account of the communication of the righteousness of Christ through imputation, something to be noted carefully. [...] Our righteousness is not in us, but in Christ. We possess it only because we participate in Christ; in fact, with him, we possess all his riches.

The basic elements of Calvin's approach can be summarized as follows. Faith unites the believer to Christ in a “mystic union.” (Here, Calvin reclaims Luther's emphasis upon the real and personal presence of Christ within believers, established through faith.) This union with Christ has a twofold effect, which Calvin refers to as “a double grace.” First, the believer's union with Christ leads directly to his or her justification. Through Christ, the believer is declared to be righteous in the sight of God. Second, on account of the believer's union with Christ – and not on account of his or her justification – the believer begins the process of being made like Christ through regeneration. Calvin thus asserts that both justification and regeneration are the results of the believer's union with Christ through faith. Justification and regeneration are distinct, but they cannot be separated in reality.

The Council of Trent on Justification

By 1540, Luther had become something of a household name throughout Europe. His writings were being read and digested, with varying degrees of enthusiasm, even in the highest ecclesiastical circles in Italy. Something had to be done if the Catholic church was to re-establish its credibility in relation to this matter. The Council of Trent, summoned in 1545, began the long process of formulating a comprehensive response to Luther. High on its agenda was the doctrine of justification.

The sixth session of the Council of Trent was brought to its close on January 13, 1547. The council's Decree on Justification sets out the Catholic teaching on justification with a considerable degree of clarity. Trent's critique of Luther's doctrine of justification focused on four main points:

1. the nature of justification
2. the nature of justifying righteousness
3. the nature of justifying faith
4. the assurance of salvation.

We shall consider each of these four points individually.

The Nature of Justification

In his earlier phase, around the years 1515–19, Luther tended to understand justification as a process of becoming, in which the sinner was gradually conformed to the likeness of Jesus Christ through a process of internal renewal (see pp. 338–9). In his later writings, however, dating from the mid-1530s and beyond, perhaps under the influence of Melanchthon's more forensic approach to justification (see p. 340), Luther tended to treat justification as a matter of being declared to be righteous rather than a process of becoming righteous. Increasingly, he came to see justification as an event which was complemented by the distinct process of regeneration and interior renewal through the action of the Holy Spirit. Justification alters the outer status of the sinner “in the sight of God” (coram Deo), while regeneration alters the sinner's inner nature.

Trent strongly opposed this view, and vigorously defended the idea, originally associated with Augustine, that justification is the process of regeneration and renewal within human nature which brings about a change in both the outer status and the inner nature of the sinner. The fourth chapter of the Decree on Justification provides the following precise definition of justification, making this point:

The justification of the sinner may be briefly defined as a translation from that state in which a human being is born a child of the first Adam, to the state of grace and of the adoption of the sons of God through the second Adam, Jesus Christ our Savior. According to the Gospel, this translation cannot come about except through the cleansing of regeneration, or a desire for this, as it is written, “Unless someone is born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he or she cannot enter into the Kingdom of God” (John 3: 5).

Justification thus includes the idea of regeneration. This brief statement is amplified in the seventh chapter, which stresses that justification “is not only a remission of sins but also the sanctification and renewal of the inner person through the voluntary reception of the grace and gifts by which an unrighteous person becomes a righteous person.” This point was given further emphasis through canon 11, which condemned anyone who taught that justification takes place “either by the sole imputation of the righteousness of Christ or by the sole remission of sins, to the exclusion of grace and charity [...] or that the grace by which we are justified is only the good will of God.”

In brief, then, Trent maintained the medieval tradition, stretching back to Augustine, which saw justification as consisting of both an event and a process – the event of being declared to be righteous through the work of Christ and the process of being made righteous through the internal work of the Holy Spirit. Reformers such as Melanchthon and Calvin distinguished these two, seeing “justification” as the event of being declared to be righteous and “sanctification” or “regeneration” as the accompanying process of internal renewal.

Catholics and Protestants thus used the same word “justification” to mean very different things. Trent used the term “justification” to refer to what, for Protestants, consisted of both justification and sanctification.

The Nature of Justifying Righteousness

Luther emphasized that sinners possess no righteousness in themselves. They have nothing within them which could ever be regarded as the basis of God's gracious decision to justify them. Luther's doctrine of the “alien righteousness of Christ” (iustitia Christi aliena) made it clear that the righteousness which justifies sinners is outside them. It is imputed, not imparted; external, not internal.

Early critics of the Reformation argued, following Augustine, that sinners are justified on the basis of an internal righteousness, graciously infused or implanted within their persons by God. This righteousness is itself given as an act of grace; it is not something merited. But, they argued, there had to be something within individuals which could allow God to justify them. Luther dismissed this idea. God can justify individuals directly, rather than through an intermediate gift of righteousness.

Trent strongly defended the Augustinian idea of justification on the basis of an internal righteousness. The seventh chapter makes this point perfectly clear:

The single formal cause [of justification] is the righteousness of God – not the righteousness by which he himself is righteous, but the righteousness by which he makes us righteous, so that, when we are endowed with it, we are “renewed in the spirit of our mind,” and are not only counted as righteous, but are called, and are in reality, righteous. [...] Nobody can be righteous except God communicates the merits of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ to him or her, and this takes place in the justification of the sinner.

The phrase “single formal cause” needs explanation. The “formal” cause is the direct, or most immediate, cause of something. Trent is thus stating that the direct cause of justification is the righteousness which God graciously imparts to us – as opposed to more distant causes of justification, such as the “efficient cause” (God) or the “meritorious cause” (Jesus Christ).

But the use of the word “single” should also be noted. One proposal for reaching agreement between Roman Catholics and Protestants, which gained especial prominence at the Colloquy of Ratisbon in 1541, was that two causes of justification should be recognized – an external righteousness (the Protestant position) and an internal righteousness (the Roman Catholic position). This compromise seemed to hold some potential. Trent, however, had no time for it. The use of the word “single” was deliberate, intended to eliminate the idea that there could be more than one such cause. The only direct cause of justification was the interior gift of righteousness.

The Nature of Justifying Faith

Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone came under severe criticism. Canon 12 condemned a central aspect of Luther's notion of justifying faith, rejecting the idea that “justifying faith is nothing other than confidence in the mercy of God, which remits sin for the sake of Christ.” In part, this rejection of Luther's doctrine of justification reflects the ambiguity, noted above (pp. 339–41), concerning the meaning of the term “justification.” Trent was alarmed that anyone should believe that they could be justified – in the Council of Trent's sense of the term – by faith, without any need for obedience or spiritual renewal. Trent, interpreting “justification” to mean both the beginning of the Christian life and its continuation and growth, believed that Luther was suggesting that simply trusting in God (without any requirement that the sinner be changed and renewed by God) was the basis of the entire Christian life.

Luther, however, did not actually hold this position, although his occasionally rather strident manner of expressing himself could have allowed this misunderstanding to arise. Rather, he was affirming that the Christian life is begun through faith, and faith alone; good works follow justification and do not cause that justification in the first place. Trent itself was perfectly prepared to concede that the Christian life was begun through faith, thus coming very close indeed to Luther's position. As the eighth chapter of the Decree on Justification declares, “we are said to be justified by faith, because faith is the beginning of human salvation, the foundation and root of all justification, without which it is impossible to please God.” This is perhaps a classic case of a theological misunderstanding, resting upon the disputed meaning of a major theological term.

The Assurance of Salvation

For Luther, as for the reformers in general, one could rest assured of one's salvation. Salvation was grounded upon the faithfulness of God to his promises of mercy; to fail to have confidence in salvation was, in effect, to doubt the reliability and trustworthiness of God. Yet this must not be seen as a supreme confidence in God, untroubled by doubt. Faith is not the same as certainty; although the theological foundation of Christian faith may be secure, the human perception of and commitment to this foundation may waver.

The Council of Trent regarded the Protestant doctrine of assurance with considerable skepticism. The ninth chapter of the Decree on Justification, entitled “Against the Vain Confidence of Heretics,” criticized the “ungodly confidence” of the reformers. While no one should doubt God's goodness and generosity, Trent declared, the reformers were seriously mistaken when they taught that “nobody is absolved from sins and justified, unless they believe with certainty that they are absolved and justified, and that absolution and justification are effected by this faith alone.” Trent insisted that “nobody can know with a certainty of faith which is not subject to error, whether they have obtained the grace of God.”

Trent's point seems to be that the reformers were seen to be making human confidence or boldness the grounds of justification, so that justification rested upon a fallible human conviction rather than upon the grace of God. The reformers, however, saw themselves as stressing that justification rested upon the promises of God; a failure to believe boldly in such promises was tantamount to calling the reliability of God into question.

The Doctrine of Predestination

In discussing the nature of grace earlier in this chapter, we noted the close relationship between “grace” and “graciousness.” God is under no obligation to bestow grace upon anyone, as if it were a commodity which functioned as a reward for meritorious actions. Grace is a gift, as Augustine never tired of emphasizing. Yet this emphasis upon the gift-character of grace, as will become clear, leads directly to the doctrine of predestination, often regarded as one of the most enigmatic and puzzling aspects of Christian theology. To explore how this connection developed, we shall consider some aspects of the theology of Augustine, before moving on to deal with later explorations of this theme.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430)

Grace is a gift, not a reward. This insight is fundamental to Augustine (see pp. 330–4). If grace were a reward, humans could purchase their salvation through good works. They could earn their redemption. Yet this, according to Augustine, was totally contrary to the New Testament proclamation of the doctrine of grace. Affirming the gift-character of grace was a bulwark against inadequate theories of salvation. We have already spent much time dealing with Augustine's understanding of grace, so will not develop this point further here.

Augustine's insight had much to commend it. However, on further inspection, it proved to have a darker side. As the Pelagian controversy became increasingly hardened and bitter, the more negative implications of Augustine's doctrine of grace became clearer. In what follows, we shall explore those implications.

If grace is a gift, God must be free to offer it, or not to offer it, without any external consideration. If it is offered on the basis of any such consideration, it is no longer a gift – it is a reward for a specific action or attitude. Grace, according to Augustine, only remains gracious if it is nothing more and nothing less than a gift, reflecting the liberality of the one who gives. But the gift is not given to all. It is particular. Grace is only given to some. Augustine's defense of “the graciousness of God,” which rests on his belief that God must be free to give or withhold grace, thus entails the recognition of the particularity, rather than the universality, of grace.

If this insight is linked with Augustine's doctrine of sin, its full implications become clear. All of humanity is contaminated by sin and unable to break free from its grasp. Only grace can set humanity free. Yet grace is not bestowed universally; it is only granted to some individuals. As a result, only some will be saved – those to whom grace is given. Predestination, for Augustine, involved the recognition that God withholds the means of salvation from those who are not elected:

This is the predestination of the saints, and nothing else: the foreknowledge and preparation of the benefits of God, whereby whoever are set free are most certainly set free. And where are the rest left by the just judgment of God, except in that mass of perdition, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon were left? Now they would have believed, if they had seen the wonderful signs of Christ. However, because it was not given to them to believe, they were not given the means to believe. From this, it seems that certain people have naturally in their minds a divine gift of understanding, by which they may be moved to faith, if they hear the words or see the signs which are adapted to their minds. But if, by virtue of a divine judgment which lies beyond us, these people have not been predestined by grace and separated from the mass of perdition, then they are without contact with either these divine words or deeds which, if heard or seen by them, would have allowed them to believe.

It is important to note that Augustine emphasized that this did not mean that some were predestined to damnation. It meant that God had selected some from the mass of fallen humanity. The chosen few were indeed predestined for salvation. The remainder were not, according to Augustine, actively condemned to damnation; they were merely not elected to salvation.

Augustine tends (although he is not entirely consistent in this respect) to treat predestination as something which is active and positive – a deliberate decision to redeem on God's part. However, as his critics pointed out, this decision to redeem some was equally a decision not to redeem others.

This question surfaced with new force during the great predestinarian controversy of the ninth century, in which the Benedictine monk Godescalp of Orbais (c.808–67, also known as Gottschalk) developed a doctrine of double predestination similar to that later to be associated with Calvin and his followers. Pursuing with relentless logic the implications of his assertion that God has predestined some to eternal damnation, Godescalp pointed out that it was thus quite improper to speak of Christ dying for such individuals; if he had, he would have died in vain, for their fate would be unaffected.

Hesitant over the implications of this assertion, Godescalc proposed that Christ died only for the elect. The scope of his redeeming work was restricted, limited only to those who were predestined to benefit from his death. Most ninth-century writers reacted to this assertion critically. It was, however, to resurface in the later Calvinist doctrine of “limited atonement” or “particular redemption,” as we shall see presently.

Catholic Debates: Thomism, Molinism, and Jansenism

Although Catholic theologians rarely regarded a theology of predestination as being of decisive importance, the matter was debated intensely during the Middle Ages and beyond. These discussions often took the form of attempts to clarify the views of Augustine of Hippo, who was widely regarded as a theological authority throughout the medieval era.

Thomas Aquinas followed Augustine in insisting that predestination was not the result of God's foreknowledge of the human response to grace, or of the moral state of individuals. First and foremost, predestination was grounded in the free choice of God. Aquinas argued that eternal life lies in “the proportion and the capacity of created nature.” Humanity therefore requires direction and assistance if it is to achieve eternal life. So, just as an archer directs an arrow toward its goal, God directs the soul toward salvation. “We give the name of ‘predestination’ to the reason why a rational creature is brought to eternal life.” This act of “direction” is not to be seen as whimsical or capricious, but as an expression of God's desire to save humanity.

Some writers of the later Middle Ages took more radical views. For example, Gregory of Rimini (c.1300–58) developed a doctrine of double predestination, arguing that God predetermined the identities of both the elect and reprobates. Nevertheless, most medieval writers took a cautious view on the doctrine, partly because they were sensitive about its pastoral implications. The cautious formulations of the Council of Trent, for example, avoided laying down any precise teaching on the question, even though the matter had been raised by the Protestant reformers of that age.

Fresh debate over the doctrine flared within Catholicism in the seventeenth century. The Molinist school (named after the Spanish Jesuit theologian Luis de Molina, 1535–1600) argued that human freedom was not contradicted by divine predestination. God knows how any individual would freely act in any possible situation, when provided with certain resources. Predestination can therefore be thought of as God bringing about a situation in which an individual freely chooses what God wants. For example, consider the case of the apostle Peter. Was he predestined to eternal salvation, and thus denied freedom to respond to God's grace? Most Molinists argued that God chose to create a world in such a way that God foresaw and foreknew how Peter would respond to grace. God is able to create those circumstances under which Peter would respond freely, thus maintaining both divine and human freedom.

Partly in reaction to such ideas, the movement known as Jansenism began to gain ground. This movement was based on the influential interpretation of Augustine of Hippo set out by Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638) in his posthumously published work Augustinus (1640). This work emphasized the notion of efficacious grace, which humanity was unable to resist. Predestination was the outcome of a free decision of God through which only a certain portion of humanity was predestined to be saved. This approach was criticized by the opponents of Jansenism as tantamount to Calvinism and therefore unacceptable to Catholics.

Such debates were never entirely resolved but ceased to play a major divisive role within the Catholic church from about 1700 onward. Within Protestantism, however, the debates proved to be much more serious and important.

Protestant Debates: Calvinism and Arminianism

The Protestant reformer John Calvin is often regarded as making the doctrine of predestination the center of his theological system. A close reading of his Institutes does not, however, bear out this often-repeated judgment. Calvin adopts a distinctly low-key approach to the doctrine, devoting a mere four chapters to its exposition (book III, chapters 21–4). Predestination is defined as “the eternal decree of God, by which he determined what he wished to make of every person. For he does not create everyone in the same condition, but ordains eternal life for some and eternal damnation for others.”

Calvin's analysis of predestination begins from observable facts. Some believe the gospel. Some do not. The primary function of the doctrine of predestination is to explain why some individuals respond to the gospel and others do not. It is an attempt to explain the variety of human responses to grace. Calvin's predestinarianism is to be regarded as reflection upon the data of human experience, interpreted in the light of Scripture, rather than something which is deduced on the basis of preconceived ideas concerning divine omnipotence. Belief in predestination is not an article of faith in its own right but is the final outcome of scripturally informed reflection on the effects of grace upon individuals in the light of the enigmas of experience.

Far from being a central premise of Calvin's thought, predestination seems to be an ancillary doctrine, concerned with explaining a puzzling pastoral aspect of the consequences of the proclamation of the gospel of grace. Yet, as Calvin's followers sought to develop and recast his thinking in the light of new intellectual developments, it was perhaps inevitable that alterations to his structuring of Christian theology might occur. In the remainder of this section, we shall explore the understanding of predestination which gained influence within Calvinism after Calvin's death, often known as the “Five Points of Calvinism.”

“Five Points of Calvinism” is a convenient way of summarizing the five central principles of Reformed soteriology (that is, the understanding of redemption associated with Calvinist writers), as they were laid down definitively by the Synod of Dort (1618–19). The five points are often referred to using the mnemonic TULIP (highly appropriate, one would think, for a synod that took place in Holland, home of that famous bulb):

T total depravity of sinful human nature

U unconditional election, in that humans are not predestined on the basis of any foreseen merit, quality, or achievement

L limited atonement, in that Christ died only for the elect (an idea developed by Godescalc, noted earlier (p. 279))

I irresistible grace, by which the elect are infallibly called and redeemed

P perseverance of the saints, in that those who are truly predestined by God cannot in any way defect from that calling.

This position is set in most later Reformed confessions of faith, such as the highly influential Westminster Confession of Faith (1646):

Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto and all to the praise of his glorious grace. [...] The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice.

An important controversy emerged within Calvinist circles in the early seventeenth century concerning the logical ordering of the “decrees of election.” Within this somewhat abstract debate, which has often become a symbol of theological obscurantism, two classic positions may be discerned:

1. The infralapsarian position, associated with François Turretini (1623–87), stated that election presupposes the fall of humanity. The decrees of election are thus oriented toward all of humanity as a “mass of sin” (massa perditionis). In other words, God's decision to predestine some to election and others to damnation is in response to the event of the Fall. The object of the decision is fallen human beings.
2. The alternative supralapsarian position, associated with Theodore Beza (1519–1605), regards election as prior to the Fall. Here, the object of the divine decree of predestination is seen as humanity prior to the Fall. The Fall is thus seen as a means of carrying out the decree of election.

A third position may also be noted, associated especially with Moses Amyraut (1596–1664) and the Calvinist Academy at Saumur, France. This position, often referred to as “hypothetical universalism,” has had relatively little impact within Calvinism.

One of the most important criticisms of the Five Points of Calvinism was associated with the movement known as Arminianism, which took its name from the Dutch writer Jakob Arminius (1560–1609), who reacted against the Reformed doctrine of particular redemption. For Arminius, Christ had died for all, not merely for the elect. Such views gained influence within Dutch Reformed circles in the aftermath of the Synod of Dort, leading to the publication of a counterproposal, known as the Remonstrance of 1610. This statement affirmed the universal character and scope of Christ's work:

God, by an eternal and unchangeable decree in Christ before the existence of the world, determined to elect from the fallen and sinful human race to everlasting life all those who, through God's grace, believe in Jesus Christ and persevere in faith and obedience. [...] Christ the Savior of the world died for all and every human being, so that he obtained, through his death on the cross, reconciliation and pardon for all, in such a way, however, that only the faithful actually enjoy the same.

The idea of predestination is thus maintained; however, its frame of reference is radically altered. The Synod of Dort understood predestination to be an individual matter, in which God predestined certain specific individuals to salvation and others to damnation. Arminianism understood it corporately, in that God has predestined that a specific group of people will be saved – namely, those who believe in Jesus Christ. By believing, individuals fulfill the predestined condition of salvation, in that they become members of the group which God has determined will be saved.

Arminianism soon achieved a major presence within eighteenth-century evangelicalism. Despite the more Calvinist views of George Whitefield (1714–70), Arminian ideas were forcefully stated within Methodism by Charles Wesley (1707–88). For example, his hymn “Would Jesus Have the Sinner Die?” states the doctrine of the universal redemption of humanity with considerable force (my italics):

O let thy love my heart constrain,
Thy love for every sinner free,
That every fallen soul of man,
May taste the grace that found out me;
That all mankind with me may prove
Thy sovereign, everlasting love.

The position also achieved considerable prominence in North America during the eighteenth century: the writings of Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) make frequent reference to what he regarded as the inconsistencies and shortcomings of his Arminian opponents. It was clearly a popular opinion, despite the misgivings regularly expressed by its critics.

Karl Barth (1886–1968)

One of the most interesting features of Karl Barth's theology is the manner in which it interacts with the theology of the period of Reformed orthodoxy. It was in part the seriousness with which Barth took the writings of this period that gave rise to the term “neo-orthodoxy” to refer to Barth's general approach (pp. 72–4). Barth's treatment of the Reformed doctrine of predestination is especially interesting: it demonstrates the manner in which he took traditional terms and gave them a radically new meaning within the context of his theology. Barth's discussion of predestination in the Church Dogmatics is based upon two central affirmations:

1. Jesus Christ is the electing God.
2. Jesus Christ is the elected human being.

This strongly Christological orientation of predestination is maintained throughout Barth's analysis of the doctrine. “In its simplest and most comprehensive form, the doctrine of predestination consists of the assertion that the divine predestination is the election of Jesus Christ. But the concept of election has a double reference – to the elector and the elected.” So exactly what has God predestined? Barth's answer to this has several components, of which the following are especially important:

1. “God has chosen to be the friend and partner of humanity.” God has elected, in a free and sovereign decision, to enter into fellowship with humanity. Barth thus affirms God's commitment to humanity, despite its sin and fallenness.
2. God chose to demonstrate that commitment in giving Christ for the redemption of humanity. “According to the Bible, this was what took place in the incarnation of the Son of God, in his death and passion, and in his resurrection from the dead.” The very act of the redemption of humanity is the expression of God's self-election as the redeemer of fallen humanity.

3. God elected to bear all of the pain and cost of redemption. God chose to accept the cross of Golgotha as a royal throne. God chose to accept the lot of fallen humanity, especially in suffering and death. God chose the path of self-humiliation and self-abasement in order to redeem humanity.
4. God elected to take from us the negative aspects of his judgment. God rejects Christ in order that we might not be rejected. The negative side of predestination, which ought, Barth suggests, properly to have fallen upon sinful humanity, is instead directed toward Christ the electing God and elected human being. God willed to bear the “rejection and condemnation and death” which are the inevitable consequences of sin. Thus, “rejection cannot again become the portion or affair of humanity.” Christ bore what sinful humanity ought to have borne, in order that they need never bear it again. For Barth, predestination is no longer a “No” spoken against humanity. Barth thus eliminates any notion of a “predestination to condemnation” on the part of humanity. The only one who is predestined to condemnation is Jesus Christ, who “from all eternity willed to suffer for us.”

The consequences of this approach are clear. Despite all appearances to the contrary, humanity cannot be condemned. In the end, grace will triumph, even over unbelief. Barth's doctrine of predestination eliminates the possibility of the rejection of humanity. In that Christ has borne the penalty and pain of rejection by God, this can never again become the portion of humanity. Taken together with his characteristic emphasis upon the “triumph of grace,” Barth's doctrine of predestination points to the universal restoration and salvation of humanity – a position which has occasioned a degree of criticism from others who would otherwise be sympathetic to his general position. The Swiss Reformed theologian Emil Brunner (1889–1966) illustrates the concerns raised by Barth's approach:

What does this statement, “that Jesus is the only really rejected person,” mean for the situation of humanity? Evidently this: That there is no possibility of condemnation. [...] The decision has already been made in Jesus Christ – for all of humanity. Whether they know it or not, believe it or not, is not so important. They are like people who seem to be perishing in a stormy sea. But in reality they are not in a sea in which one can drown, but in shallow waters, in which it is impossible to drown. Only they do not know it.

Predestination and Economics: The Weber Thesis

One of the most fascinating consequences of the Calvinist emphasis upon predestination is its impact upon the attitudes of those who held the belief. Of especial importance is the question of assurance: how may the believer know that he or she really is among the elect? Although Calvin stressed that works are not the grounds of salvation, he nevertheless allowed it to be understood that they are, in some vague way, the grounds of assurance. Works may be regarded as “the testimonies of God dwelling and ruling within us.” Believers are not saved by works; rather, their salvation is demonstrated by works. “The grace of good works [...] demonstrates that the spirit of adoption has been given to us.” This tendency to regard works as evidence of election may be seen as the first stage in the articulation of a work ethic with significant pastoral overtones: it is by worldly activism that believers can assure their troubled conscience that they are among the elect.

Anxiety over this question of election was subsequently a pervasive feature of Calvinist spirituality, and was generally treated at some length by Calvinist preachers and spiritual writers. The basic answer given, however, remained substantially the same: the believer who performs good works has indeed been chosen. This idea was often stated in terms of the “practical syllogism,” an argument constructed along the following lines:

1. All who are elected exhibit certain signs as a consequence of that election.
2. But I exhibit those signs.
3. Therefore I am among the elect.

The grounds of certainty of election are thus based on the presence of “certain signs” in the life of the believer. There was thus a significant psychological pressure to demonstrate one's election to oneself and the world in general by exhibiting its signs – among which was the wholehearted commitment to serve and glorify God by laboring in the world. It is this pressure that, according to the sociologist Max Weber (1864–1920), lay behind the emergence of capitalism within Calvinist societies.

The popular version of the Weber thesis declares that capitalism is a direct result of the Protestant Reformation. This is historically untenable and, in any case, is not what Weber actually said. Weber stressed that he had no intention whatsoever of maintaining such a foolish and doctrinaire thesis as that the spirit of capitalism [...] could only have arisen as a result of certain effects of the Reformation. In itself, the fact that certain important forms of capitalistic business organizations are known to be considerably older than the Reformation is a sufficient refutation of such a claim.

Rather, Weber argued that a new “spirit of capitalism” emerged in the sixteenth century. It is not so much capitalism as a specific form of capitalism which needs to be explained.

Protestantism, Weber argued, generated the psychological preconditions essential to the development of modern capitalism. Indeed, Weber located the fundamental contribution of Calvinism as lying in its generation of psychological impulses on account of its belief systems. Weber laid especial stress upon the notion of “calling,” which he linked with the Calvinist idea of predestination. Calvinists, assured of their personal salvation, were enabled to engage in worldly activity without serious anxiety regarding their salvation as a consequence. The pressure to prove one's election led to the active pursuit of worldly success – a success which, as history indicates, was generally not slow in coming.

It is not our concern here to provide a critique of the Weber thesis. In some circles, it is regarded as utterly discredited; in others, it lives on. Our concern is simply to note that Weber rightly discerned that religious ideas could have a powerful economic and social impact upon early modern Europe. The very fact that Weber suggested that the religious thought of the Reformation was capable of providing the stimulus needed for the development of modern capitalism itself is a powerful testimony to the need to study theology if human history is to be fully understood. It also indicates that apparently abstract ideas – such as predestination – can prove to have a very concrete impact upon history!

The Darwinian Controversy and the Nature of Humanity

One of the most vigorous debates within modern Christian thought concerns the implications of Darwinism for religious belief – above all, the theological status of human nature. Traditional Christian theology regarded humanity as the height of God's creation, distinguished from the remainder of the created order by being created in the image of God. On this traditional reading of things, humanity is located within the created order as a whole, yet stands above it on account of its unique relationship to God, articulated in the notion of the imago Dei (see pp. 327–9). Yet Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) posed an implicit, and The Descent of Man (1871) an explicit, challenge to this view. Humanity had emerged, over a vast period of time, from within the natural order.

If there was one aspect of his own theory of evolution which left Charles Darwin feeling unsettled, it was its implications for the status and identity of the human race. In every edition of the Origin of Species, Darwin consistently stated that his proposed mechanism of natural selection did not entail any fixed or universal law of progressive development. It was not an easy conclusion for Darwin, or for his age. The conclusion to The Descent of Man speaks of humanity in exalted terms while insisting upon its “lowly” biological origins:

Man may be excused for feeling some pride at having risen, though not through his own exertions, to the very summit of the organic scale; and the fact of his having thus risen, instead of having been aboriginally placed there, may give him hope for a still higher destiny in the distant future. But we are not here concerned with hopes or fears, only with the truth as far as our reason permits us to discover it; and I have given the evidence to the best of my ability. We must, however, acknowledge, as it seems to me, that man with all his noble qualities [...] still bears in his bodily frame the indelible stamp of his lowly origin.

Most Darwinists would insist that it is a corollary of an evolutionary worldview that we must recognize that we are animals, part of the evolutionary process. Darwinism thus critiques the absolutist assumptions concerning the place of humanity within nature that lie behind “speciesism” – a term introduced by Richard Ryder (born 1940) and given wider currency by Peter Singer (born 1946), currently of Princeton University. This has raised considerable difficulties beyond the realm of traditional religion, in that many political and ethical theories are predicated on the assumption of the privileged status of humanity within nature, whether this is justified on religious or secular grounds.

So what are the Christian responses to Darwinism? It is now a century and a half since the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species. During that time, at least four categories of response have emerged, each of which will be considered briefly below.

Young-Earth Creationism

This position represents the continuation of the “common reading” of Genesis, which was widely encountered in popular and at least some academic writing before 1800. On this view, the earth was created in its basic form between 6,000 and 10,000 years ago. Young-earth creationists generally read the first two chapters of the book of Genesis in a way that allows for no living creatures of any kind before Eden, and no death before the Fall. Most young-earth creationists hold that all living things were created simultaneously, within the timeframe proposed by the Genesis creation accounts, with the Hebrew word yom (“day”) meaning a period of 24 hours. The fossil records, which point to a much greater timescale and to the existence of extinct species, are often understood to date from the time of Noah's flood. This viewpoint is often, but not universally, stated in the forms of a 144-hour creation and a universal flood. Representative young-earth creationists include Henry Madison Morris (1918–2006) and Douglas F. Kelly.

Old-Earth Creationism

This view has a long history and is probably the majority viewpoint within conservative Protestant circles. It has no particular difficulty with the vast age of the world, and argues that the “young-earth” approach requires modification in at least two respects. First, the Hebrew word yom may need to be interpreted as an “indefinite time participle” (not unlike the English word “while”), signifying an indeterminate period of time which is given specificity by its context. In other words, the word “day” in the Genesis creation accounts is to be interpreted as a long period of time, not a specific period of 24 hours. Second, there may be a large gap between Genesis 1: 1 and Genesis 1: 2. In other words, the narrative is not understood to be continuous but to make way for the intervention of a substantial period of time between the primordial act of creation of the universe and the emergence of life on earth. This viewpoint is advocated by the famous Schofield Reference Bible, first published in 1909, although the ideas can be traced back to writers such as the earlier nineteenth-century Scottish theologian Thomas Chalmers (1780–1847).

Intelligent Design

This movement, which has gained considerable influence in the United States in recent years, argues that the biosphere is possessed of an “irreducible complexity” which makes it impossible to explain its origins and development in any method other than intelligent design.

Intelligent design does not deny biological evolution; its most fundamental criticism of Darwinism is teleological – that evolution has no goal. The intelligent-design movement argues that standard Darwinism runs into significant explanatory difficulties which can only be adequately resolved through the intentional creation of individual species. Its critics argue that these difficulties are overstated, or that they will in due course be resolved by future theoretical advances. Although the movement avoids direct identification of God with this intelligent designer (presumably for political reasons), it is clear that this assumption is intrinsic to its working methods. The movement is particularly associated with Michael Behe (born 1952), author of Darwin's Black Box (1996), and William Dembski (born 1960), author of Intelligent Design: The Bridge between Science and Theology (1999). Both Behe and Dembski are fellows of the Discovery Institute, Seattle.

Evolutionary Theism

A final approach argues that evolution is to be understood as God's chosen method of bringing life into existence from inorganic materials and of creating complexity within life. Whereas Darwinism gives a significant place to random events in the evolutionary process, evolutionary theism sees the process as divinely directed. The roots of this approach can be found in Augustine of Hippo, particularly in his exegesis of Genesis 1–2 and his use of the idea of “seed-bearing reasons” within a providentially directed process of cosmic development (see pp. 197–8). Some evolutionary theists propose that each level of complexity is to be explained on the basis of “God working within the system,” perhaps at the quantum level. Others adopt a “fully gifted creation” perspective, arguing that God built in the potential for the emergence and complexity of life in the initial act of creation, so that further acts of divine intervention are not required. The English biochemist and theologian Arthur Peacocke (1924–2006) is particularly associated with such an approach.

How should we evaluate these positions and their underlying religious and scientific concerns? Perhaps the most important point to make is simply this: the natural sciences, including the various Darwinian paradigms, are patient of atheist, theist, and agnostic interpretations and accommodations – but demand and necessitate none of them. Darwinism can be “spun” in ways that are seemingly totally consistent with and seemingly totally opposed to Christian belief. Both “Darwinism” and “Christianity” designate a spectrum of possibilities, making determining their conceptual overlaps and tensions both problematic and critically dependent on definitional issues. Perhaps one of the more interesting paradoxes of the contemporary religious scene is that, for precisely these reasons, Darwinism has been prematurely and unnecessarily branded as “atheist” on the left by writers such as Richard Dawkins (born 1941) and on the right by various American creationist individuals and organizations.

As the conservative Protestant theologian Benjamin B. Warfield (1851–1921) uncontroversially pointed out, serious issues of biblical interpretation often underlie such controversies. Perhaps somewhat more controversially, but almost certainly correctly, Warfield also observed that scientific advance offered a means by which the church could “check out” its interpretation of the Bible, avoiding being locked into an arcane or archaic biblical interpretation which, by force of tradition, was assumed to be the self-evident meaning of the Bible itself. It is for this reason that Darwinism has proved to be especially controversial within the conservative American Protestant constituency, whose general approach to biblical interpretation is often based on the seemingly straightforward (but actually nuanced and complex) notion of the “plain sense of Scripture.” (Similar issues arise within the Islamic constituency concerning the interpretation of the Qu’ran.) For precisely the same reason, Darwinism has proved much more acceptable to Catholic writers, on account of the notion of the magisterial interpretation of an occasionally opaque Scripture.

Yet one point must be made in closing. When all is said and done, Darwinism is a scientific theory, provisional in its status and open to modification, correction, development, or even ultimate abandonment as the process of scientific advance continues. It may be the received scientific wisdom of our age; no study of the history of science would be unwise enough to suggest that it is necessarily, and possibly uniquely, immune to the process of radical theory change that has characterized scientific advance in the past. So what will this debate look like in a century? Will we have moved on, scientifically and theologically? I am no prophet, and have no answers on this. It would, however, be extremely unwise to suppose that the present age has settled, or even begun to settle, the question of the relationship between religious faith and the scientific exploration of the biological origins of life.

The present chapter has briefly surveyed a vast amount of material relating to the Christian understandings of human nature, sin, and grace. Only a fraction of the debates within the Christian tradition have been explored. Nevertheless, central landmarks have been identified which remain of decisive importance to the continuing debates within Christianity on such issues.

Questions for Chapter 14

1. Give a concise summary of the main issues at stake in the Pelagian controversy.
2. Why did Augustine believe in original sin?
3. Imagine that you are explaining the idea of “grace” to a non-theologian with a limited attention span. What could you say about the idea in 200 words or fewer?
4. Martin Luther is associated with the doctrine of “justification by faith alone.” What did he mean by this? And what were the alternatives he rejected?
5. “If you aren't predestined, then go and get yourself predestined.” How does this Calvinist attitude relate to Weber's thesis concerning the origins of capitalism?
6. Why was Darwinism such a powerful challenge to traditional Christian belief? And how has Christian theology responded to this challenge?

THE CHURCH

The area of Christian theology which deals with the doctrine of the church is usually referred to as “ecclesiology” (Greek: ekklesia, “church”) and is of major importance to anyone proposing to engage in pastoral ministry of any kind. Ecclesiological questions break into ministry at point after point. What sort of body is the church? How does this understanding of what the church is affect what the church is meant to do? Ecclesiology is that area of theology which seeks to give theoretical justification to an institution which has undergone development and change down the centuries, set against an altering social and political context.

Yet it is important to appreciate that the church existed as an institution, as an historical reality, before Christians began to reflect seriously and systematically on what kind of institution the church was meant to be. Theoretical reflection on the identity and calling of the church follow on from the existence of the church as a community of faith. To study Christian understandings of the church is to gain insights into the way in which institutions adapt in order to develop and to survive. The present chapter aims to explore some of the issues which arise from this remarkable history of development down the ages.

Biblical Models of the Church

Any attempt to study the development of Christian theories of the church must begin with the origins of the community of faith, described in the Bible, as well as the emerging understandings of the nature and identity of that community. The church has always stressed its historical and theological continuity with the people of Israel; for this reason, we must begin our exploration with the Old Testament.

The Old Testament

How did Israel understand its identity, and how were these understandings maintained by its institutions? The noted American Old Testament scholar Walter Brueggemann (born 1933) argues that three distinct phases can be seen in Israel's development of its sense of identity and purpose as a people, reflecting the different situations in which it found itself.

The first phase of its existence (c.1250–1000 BC) lasted until the founding of the monarchy under Saul. During this period, Israel existed without a temple, priests, sages, or prophets. Its identity as a people was not defined by institutions but by “a common commitment to Israel's central story.”

The second phase pertained from 1000 to 587 BC. During this long period, which ended with the Babylonian captivity of the people of Jerusalem, Israel was governed by a monarchy. Brueggemann points to four features which ensured that Israel was able to maintain and consolidate its identity:

1. The temple and its priests provided legitimate and stable leadership over an extended period.
2. The kings provided essentially secular leadership of the nation while at the same time being committed to the same religious ideas and values as the temple and its priests.
3. The book of Proverbs bears witness to a group of “sages,” corresponding to the western notion of an “intelligentsia,” who provided intellectual legitimacy to the nation.
4. During this period, the prophets represented a means of divine guidance at points of particular difficulty or turbulence.

Brueggemann finds that a third model arose after the return of the inhabitants of Jerusalem from their exile in Babylon in 587 BC to the period of the New Testament. In this “postexilic” or “second temple” period, Israel was a much smaller nation, faced with serious problems in maintaining its identity in the face of occupation, initially by the Persians and subsequently by the Greeks and Romans. Faced with the erosion of its distinctive identity in the face of these “universalizing cultures,” Israel sought to find its identity through links with the past. Brueggemann emphasizes the importance of texts during this era, as these provided a means by which the “threatened present generation” could connect up with “the horizon of reference points from the past.”

The New Testament

The New Testament stresses the continuity between Israel and the Christian church, and offers a series of models for understanding the theological identity of the church. In what follows, we shall note five of these models.

1. The church as the people of God. This image emphasizes the continuity of the church with Israel, sharing the covenant promises made to Abraham. It is thus especially important for Paul that Christians are seen to share the same faith as Abraham (Romans 4: 1–16; Galatians 3: 6–18). The church has been chosen or called to be the people of God, just as God called Israel in the past. “You are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, in order that you may proclaim the mighty acts of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (1 Peter 2: 9).
2. The church as a community of salvation. This image emphasizes that the church is called into being both in response to God's work of salvation and as a means of proclaiming and extending that work to the world. This theme is evident in the evangelistic imperatives within the New Testament, which speak of the church as the body which is called to bear witness as the “salt of the earth” and the “light of the world” (Matthew 5: 13–16), charged with the responsibility of going out to “make disciples of all nations” (Matthew 28: 19).

3. The church as the body of Christ. This imagery is found particularly in the Pauline letters (see especially 1 Corinthians 12: 12–31). The faith of the individual believer and baptism (Romans 6: 3–5) are understood to secure incorporation into the body of Christ. This corporate understanding of the church is also reinforced by other types of imagery in the New Testament, such as the Johannine image of the believer being attached or connected to Jesus Christ as the “true vine” (John 15: 5).
4. The church as a servant people. Once more, this image emphasizes the continuity between the old and new covenants. God chose and called Israel to serve him; in the same way, God chose and called the church for service. This theme is reflected in the terminology of the early church for its leaders. The two main Greek words for church leaders are doulos (“servant,” or possibly even “slave”) and diakonos (“someone who waits at a table”). Paul brought this theme into sharp focus when he told the Corinthian Christians that he and his companions “proclaim Jesus Christ as Lord and ourselves as your slaves for Jesus's sake” (2 Corinthians 4: 5).
5. The church as the community of the Spirit. The early history of the church, as related in the Acts of the Apostles, stresses the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit within the church. The presence of the Spirit enables the church to witness and to grow. For Paul, the Spirit is not merely a theological resource, useful in ministry. Its presence within the church is a sign of the coming of God's new age, and the distinctive role that the church must play in bringing about the kingdom of God on earth. The Spirit is to be seen as a “seal” of the individual's redemption and the church's mission (Ephesians 4: 30).

These, then, are some of the models of the church found in the New Testament. Yet they are not fully developed. The task of enlarging the Christian vision of the identity of the church was bequeathed to their successors by the New Testament writers. In what follows, we shall explore some of the ways in which those successors did this.

The Early Development of Ecclesiology

Ecclesiology was not a major issue in the early church. The eastern church showed no awareness of the potential importance of the issue. Most Greek patristic writers of the first five centuries contented themselves with describing the church using recognizably scriptural images, without choosing to probe further. Thus, Isidore of Pelusium (died c.450) defined the church as “the assembly of saints joined together by correct faith and an excellent manner of life.” A number of themes can be identified in early Christian reflection on the nature of the church, including the following:

1. The church is a spiritual society, which replaces Israel as the people of God in the world.
2. All Christians are made one in Christ, despite their different origins and backgrounds.
3. The church is the repository of true Christian teaching.
4. The church gathers the faithful throughout the world together, in order to enable them to grow in faith and holiness.

Yet these themes were not woven together into a comprehensive theory of the nature of the church in the first four centuries. In part, this relative lack of interest in developing the doctrine of the church reflected the political situation of the time. The church was at best a barely tolerated, and at worst a vigorously persecuted, organization within the sphere of authority of a hostile pagan state – namely, the Roman empire.

With the conversion of Constantine (272–337; reigned 306–37), the situation changed radically. Increasingly, theologians began to draw parallels between the Roman empire and the Christian church – whether negatively (as with Hippolytus of Rome, 170–235, who saw the empire as a satanic imitation of the church) or positively (as with Eusebius of Caesarea (c.263–339), who saw the empire as a divinely ordained institution charged with the task of preparing the world for the coming of the kingdom of Christ).

One practical issue led to increased reflection on an ecclesiological issue. At an early stage, rivalry developed between the leaders of the churches, especially those at Rome and Constantinople. A number of centers were held in particular esteem during the first four centuries; of these, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Rome were of notable importance. However, by the end of the fourth century it was becoming increasingly clear that Rome, as the center of the Roman empire, had acquired a position of especial prominence. The term “pope” (from the Latin papa, “father”) was initially used of any Christian bishop; gradually, the term came to be used more often of the most important bishop in the church – the bishop of Rome. From 1073, the title papa was used exclusively to refer to the bishop of Rome. The question therefore began to arise: what authority did the bishop of Rome have outside his own diocese?

In practical terms, the answer was quite simple – a lot. The bishop of Rome (we shall use the term “pope” from now on, despite the slight anachronism this involves) was often called upon to arbitrate in church disputes of various kinds, throughout the entire Mediterranean. When Nestorius (c.386–c.451) and Cyril of Jerusalem (c.313–86) became embroiled in endless Christological debates in the fifth century and it became clear that no resolution was in sight, they each hastened to Rome to gain papal support.

But did this priority rest upon any theological foundation? The eastern churches had no hesitation in declaring that it did not. Others, however, were not so sure. The pope was the successor to St.

Peter, who had been martyred at Rome. In view of the apparent “primacy of Peter” in the New Testament (Matthew 16: 18), did this not give the successors of Peter authority over others? It seemed to many, even within the eastern churches, that, in some inscrutable manner, the spiritual authority of Peter had been transmitted to his successors as bishops of Rome. Furthermore, Rome was the “eternal city,” the capital of the great Roman empire. It is not difficult to see how this political authority could be translated into theological terms. Cyprian of Carthage (died 258) is an example of a western writer who was a vigorous defender of the primacy of the Roman see throughout the Christian world. This question would become of renewed importance at a number of junctures in church history, of which the Reformation is a particularly obvious instance.

The Donatist Controversy

In the end, it was the western church that forced the pace of theological reflection on the nature and identity of the church. It seems to be a general rule of the development of Christian doctrine that development is occasioned by controversy. A stimulus seems to have been required to provoke sustained theological reflection. In the case of ecclesiology, that stimulus was provided by a controversy centering upon Roman North Africa which has passed into history as “the Donatist controversy.”

Under the Roman emperor Diocletian (244–311; reigned 284–305), the Christian church was subject to various degrees of persecution. The origins of the persecution date from 303; it finally ended with the conversion of Constantine and the issuing of the Edict of Milan in 313. Under an edict of February 303, Christian books were ordered to be burned and churches demolished. Those Christian leaders who handed over their books to be burned came to be known as traditores – “those who handed over [their books].” The modern word “traitor” derives from the same root.

One such traditor was Felix of Aptunga, who later consecrated Caecilian as bishop of Carthage in 311. Many local Christians were outraged that such a person should have been allowed to be involved in this consecration and declared that they could not accept the authority of Caecilian as a result. The new bishop's authority was compromised, it was argued, on account of the fact that the bishop who had consecrated him had lapsed under the pressure of persecution. The hierarchy of the Catholic church was thus tainted as a result of this development. The church ought to be pure and should not be permitted to include such people.

By the time Augustine of Hippo (354–430) returned to Africa in 388, a breakaway faction had established itself as the leading Christian body in the region, with especially strong support from the local African population. Sociological issues clouded theological debate; the Donatists (so named after the breakaway African church leader Donatus, died c.355) tended to draw their support from the indigenous population, whereas the Catholics drew theirs from Roman colonists.

The theological issues involved are of considerable importance and relate directly to a serious tension within the theology of a leading figure of the African church in the third century – Cyprian of Carthage. In his Unity of the Catholic Church (251), Cyprian had defended two major related beliefs. First, schism is totally and absolutely unjustified. The unity of the church cannot be broken, on any pretext whatsoever. To step outside the bounds of the church is to forfeit any possibility of salvation. Second, it therefore follows that lapsed or schismatic bishops are deprived of all ability to administer the sacraments or act as ministers of the Christian church. By passing outside the sphere of the church, they have lost their spiritual gifts and authority. They should therefore not be permitted to ordain priests or bishops. Any whom they have ordained must be regarded as invalidly ordained; any whom they have baptized must be regarded as invalidly baptized. But what happens if a bishop lapses under persecution and subsequently repents? Cyprian's theory is open to two quite different lines of interpretation:

1. By lapsing, the bishop has committed the sin of apostasy (literally, “falling away”). He has therefore placed himself outside the bounds of the church and can no longer be regarded as administering the sacraments validly.
2. By his repentance, the bishop has been restored to grace and is able to continue administering the sacraments validly.

The Donatists adopted the first such position, the Catholics (as their opponents came to be universally known) the second.

Augustine responded to the Donatist challenge by putting forward a theory of the church which he believed was more firmly grounded in the New Testament than the Donatist teaching. In particular, Augustine emphasized the sinfulness of Christians. The church is not meant to be a “pure body,” a society of saints, but a “mixed body” (corpus permixtum) of saints and sinners. Augustine found this image in two biblical parables: the parable of the net which catches many fishes, and the parable of the wheat and the weeds. This second parable (Matthew 13: 24–31) is of especial importance, and requires further discussion.

The parable tells of a farmer who sowed seed and discovered that the resulting crop included both wheat and weeds. What could be done about it? To attempt to separate the wheat and the weeds while both were still growing would be to court disaster, probably involving damaging the wheat while trying to get rid of the weeds. But, at the harvest, all the plants – whether wheat or weeds – are cut down and sorted out, thus avoiding damaging the wheat. The separation of the good and the evil thus takes place at the end of time, not in history. For Augustine, this parable refers to the church in the world. It must expect to find itself including both saints and sinners. To attempt a separation in this world is premature and improper. That separation will take place in God's own time, at the end of history. No human can make that judgment or separation in God's place.

A related biblical passage concerns John the Baptist's prediction that Jesus of Nazareth will bring a judgment that can be compared to a threshing floor (Matthew 3: 11–12). Both the wheat and the chaff lie on the threshing floor, and are to be separated. So how is this to be interpreted? Two very different approaches emerged. For the Donatists, the threshing floor referred to the world at large, containing both wheat and chaff. The process of separation led to the emergence of the church as the community of the pure; the chaff remained in the world. For Augustine, the church itself was the threshing floor, in that its members included both wheat and chaff.

So in what sense can the church meaningfully be described as “holy”? For Augustine, the holiness in question is not that of its members but of Christ. The church cannot be a congregation of saints in this world, since its members are contaminated with original sin. However, the church is sanctified and made holy by Christ – a holiness which will be perfected and finally realized at the Last Judgment. In addition to offering this theological analysis of holiness, Augustine slyly noted that the Donatists failed to live up to their own high standards of morality. They were, he suggested, just as capable as their opponents of moral lapses.

Augustine made a similar point in connection with the theology of the sacraments. For the Donatists, sacraments – such as baptism and the Eucharist or Lord's Supper – were only effective if they were administered by someone of unquestionable moral and doctrinal purity. This attitude can be seen in a letter written in 402 by Petilian, the Donatist bishop of Cirta, to Augustine, which sets out at some length the Donatist insistence that the validity of the sacraments is totally dependent upon the moral worthiness of those who administer them. We shall consider this point further in Chapter 16 (pp. 386–8).

Responding to this, Augustine argued that Donatism laid excessive emphasis upon the qualities of the human agent and gave insufficient weight to the grace of Jesus Christ. It is, he argued, impossible for fallen human beings to make distinctions concerning who is pure and impure, worthy or unworthy. This view, which is totally consistent with his understanding of the church as a “mixed body” of saints and sinners, holds that the efficacy of a sacrament rests not upon the merits of the individual administering it but upon the merits of the one who instituted them in the first place – Jesus Christ. The validity of sacraments is thus independent of the merits of those who administer them. There may be a pastoral advantage to the sacraments being administered by someone of unblemished reputation, but there is no theological necessity for this. Christ is the ultimate guarantor of the efficacy of the sacraments; the minister plays only a secondary and subordinate role.

Donatus and his followers insisted that the efficacy of the church and its sacramental system was dependent upon the moral or cultic purity of its representatives. The grace and healing power of the Christian gospel were thus understood to be contingent upon the purity of the church and its ministers. For Augustine, this amounted to making salvation indirectly dependent upon human purity, rather than the grace of Christ. Ministers and sacraments were merely the channels, not the cause, of the grace of God. Donatism threatened to make the salvation of humanity dependent upon holy human agents, rather than upon the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Christ thus plays a secondary role in both the securing and sustaining of salvation, whereas the human agent plays a primary role of crucial importance.

We see here a major theme of Augustine of Hippo's understanding of the Christian faith: that human nature is fallen, wounded, and frail, standing in need of the healing and restoring grace of God. The church, according to Augustine, is rather to be compared to a hospital than to a club of healthy people. It is a place of healing for people who know that they stand in need of forgiveness and renewal. The Christian life is a process of being healed from sin, rather than a life of sinlessness, as if the cure were completed and the patient restored to full health. The church is an infirmary for the sick and for convalescents. It is only in heaven that we will finally be righteous and healthy.

Augustine thus argued that Donatism was fatally flawed. The church is, and is meant to be, a mixed body. Sin is an inevitable aspect of the life of the church in the present age, and is neither the occasion nor the justification for schism. Yet precisely the schism that Augustine feared and detested so much would eventually come about in the sixteenth century, with the formation of breakaway Protestant churches in western Europe as a result of the Reformation. It is to these major developments that we now turn.

Early Protestant Doctrines of the Church

The sixteenth century was a period of crucial importance for reflection on the nature and identity of the Christian church. The reformers were convinced that the church of their day and age had lost sight of the doctrine of grace, which Martin Luther (1483–1546) regarded as the center of the Christian gospel. Thus, Luther declared that his doctrine of justification by faith alone was the articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae, “the article by which the church stands or falls.” Convinced that the Catholic church had lost sight of this doctrine, he concluded (with some reluctance, it would seem) that it had lost its claim to be considered the authentic Christian church.

His Catholic opponents responded to this suggestion with derision: Luther was simply creating a breakaway faction which had no connection with the church. In other words, he was a schismatic – and had not Augustine himself condemned schism? Had not he placed enormous emphasis upon the unity of the church, which Luther now threatened to disrupt? Luther, it seemed, could only uphold Augustine's doctrine of grace by rejecting Augustine's doctrine of the church. It is in the context of this tension between two aspects of Augustine's thought, which proved to be incompatible in the sixteenth century, that the Reformation understandings of the nature of the church are to be seen.

In what follows, we shall consider early Protestant doctrines of the church, noting some of the most distinctive developments within both the mainstream (or “magisterial”) Reformation and the smaller radical wing of the Reformation. We begin by considering the new lines of development found in the writings of Martin Luther.

Martin Luther (1483–1546)

Luther's early views on the nature of the church reflect his emphasis on the Word of God: the Word of God goes forth conquering, and wherever it conquers and gains true obedience to God is the church:

Now, anywhere you hear or see [the Word of God] preached, believed, confessed, and acted upon, do not doubt that the true ecclesia sancta catholica, a “holy Christian people” must be there, even though there are very few of them. For God's word “shall not return empty” (Isaiah 55: 11), but must possess at least a fourth or a part of the field. And even if there were no other sign than this alone, it would be enough to prove that a holy Christian people must exist there, for God's word cannot be without God's people and conversely, God's people cannot be without God's word. For who would preach the word, or hear it preached, if there were no people of God? And what could or would God's people believe, if there were no word of God?

Neither an episcopally ordained ministry nor an institutional continuity with the apostolic church is therefore necessary to safeguard the existence of the church, whereas the preaching of the gospel is essential to the identity of that church. “Where the word is, there is faith; and where faith is, there is the true church.” The visible church is constituted by the preaching of the Word of God: no human assembly may claim to be the “church of God” unless it is founded on this gospel. It is more important to preach the same gospel as the apostles than to be a member of an institution which is historically derived from them. A similar understanding of the church was shared by Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560), Luther's colleague at Wittenberg, who conceived of the church primarily in terms of its function of administering the means of grace.

But, if the church was defined not in institutional terms but by the preaching of the gospel, how could Luther distinguish his views from those of more radical reformers? Luther himself had conceded that “the church is holy even where the fanatics [Luther's term for the radicals] are dominant, so long as they do not deny the word and the sacraments.” Luther asserted the need for an institutional church, declaring that the historical institution of the church is a divinely ordained means of grace. But, in countering the radicals by asserting that the church was indeed visible and institutional, Luther found himself having difficulty in distinguishing his views from those of his Catholic opponents. Luther was thus obliged to assert that “the false church has only the appearance, although it also possesses the Christian offices.” In other words, the medieval church may have looked like the real thing but it was really something rather different.

It will thus be clear that there are certain difficulties and shortcomings associated with Luther's approach. In part, this may reflect the general belief within reforming circles during the 1520s that separation from the Catholic church was a temporary matter. What point was there in developing extensive theories of the church – to give legitimation to the breakaway evangelical factions – when reunion with a reformed Catholic church was only a matter of time? It was only in the 1540s, when such a reunion was finally realized to be nothing more than a dream, that Protestant theologians began to give sustained attention to formulating distinctively Protestant doctrines of the church. John Calvin (1509–64) is perhaps the most significant such writer.

An event of major importance to the Reformation took place in 1541. The Colloquy of Ratisbon collapsed. This conference, held at Regensburg, represented a last-ditch attempt to reach a compromise between Catholics and Protestants which would allow the latter to rejoin the church from which they had temporarily withdrawn. It must be stressed that the reformers initially regarded themselves as having removed themselves from the Catholic church only temporarily. There was a full expectation of a return, once the situation had improved. The failure of Regensburg put an end to any such hope.

A new situation now developed. Up to 1541, there had been no real need for Protestant writers to develop theories of the church. Luther's early ecclesiology was actually a holding measure, designed to justify a temporary withdrawal from the church. It lacks rigor and conviction, precisely because Luther believed that there was no need to develop a full-blown theory of the church. After all, a return to the Catholic church was just around the corner. The second generation of reformers, among whom Calvin stands out as supreme, was faced with the challenge of developing a coherent and systematic ecclesiology, on the basis of the realization that separation from the main body of the Catholic church would continue indefinitely.

Calvin rose to this challenge, and offered what is widely regarded as the most sophisticated statement of a Protestant ecclesiology of the sixteenth century. For Calvin, the marks of the true church were:

1. that the Word of God should be preached and
2. that the sacraments should be rightly administered.

If these two criteria were met by a community, Calvin declared, then it was a truly Christian church:

Wherever we see the Word of God purely preached and listened to, and the sacraments administered according to Christ's institution, it is in no way to be doubted that a church of God exists. For his promise cannot fail: "Wherever two or three are gathered in my name, there I am in the midst of them" (Matthew 18: 20). [...] If the ministry has the Word and honors it, if it has the administration of the sacraments, it deserves without doubt to be held and considered a church.

The true church is therefore to be found where the gospel is rightly preached and the sacraments are rightly administered.

Calvin drew an important distinction between the visible and the invisible church. At one level, the church is the community of Christian believers, a visible group. It is also, however, the fellowship of saints and the company of the elect – an invisible entity. In its invisible aspect, the church is the invisible assembly of the elect, known only to God; in its visible aspect, it is the community of believers on earth. The former consists only of the elect; the latter includes both good and evil, elect and reprobate. The former is an object of faith and hope; the latter of present experience. The distinction between them is eschatological: the invisible church is the church which will come into being at the end of time, as God ushers in the final judgment of humanity. Calvin stresses that all believers are obliged to honor and to remain committed to the visible church, despite its weaknesses, on account of the invisible church, the true body of Christ. Despite this, there is only one church, a single entity with Jesus Christ as its head.

The distinction between the visible and invisible churches has two important consequences. In the first place, it is to be expected that the visible church will include both the elect and the reprobate. As we saw earlier, Augustine of Hippo had made this point against the Donatists, using the parable of the wheat and the tares (Matthew 13: 24–30) as his basis. It lies beyond human competence to discern their difference, correlating human qualities with divine favor (in any case, Calvin's doctrine of predestination precludes such grounds of election).

Having defined the nature of the church, Calvin proceeds to explore its importance. Why is there any need for a church – understood, that is, as an institution, rather than a building – in the first place? Just as God redeemed human beings within the historical process through the incarnation, so God sanctifies them within that same process by founding an institution dedicated to that goal. God uses certain definite earthly means to work out the salvation of the elect. The church is thus identified as a divinely founded body within which God effects the sanctification of the elect. Calvin expresses this idea as follows:

I shall begin then, with the church, into the bosom of which God is pleased to gather his children, not only so that they may be nourished by her assistance and ministry while they are infants and children, but also so that they may be guided by her motherly care until they mature and reach the goal of faith. “For what God has joined together, no one shall divide” (Mark 10: 9). For those to whom God is Father, the church shall also be their mother.

Calvin confirms this high doctrine of the church by citing the two great ecclesiological maxims of Cyprian of Carthage: “You cannot have God as your father unless you have the church for your mother” and “Outside the church there is no hope of remission of sins nor any salvation” (see pp. 370–1). The institution of the church is thus to be seen as a necessary, helpful, God-given, and God-ordained means of spiritual growth and development.

The Radical Reformation

For theologians of the radical Reformation (or “Anabaptism”), such as Sebastian Franck (1499–1543) and Menno Simons (1496–1551), the apostolic church had been totally compromised through its close links with the state, dating back to the conversion of the emperor Constantine. As an institution, the church was corrupted by human power struggles and ambition. Franck wrote thus:

I believe that the outward Church of Christ, including all its gifts and sacraments, because of the breaking in and laying waste by antichrist right after the death of the Apostles, went up into heaven, and lies concealed in the Spirit and in truth. I am thus quite certain that for fourteen hundred years now there has existed no gathered Church nor any sacrament.

The true church was in heaven, and its institutional parodies were on earth. The church thus needed to separate itself from secular society, especially the authority of the magistracy. The radical Reformation conceived of the church as an “alternative society” within the mainstream of sixteenth-century European culture. Just as the pre-

Constantinian church existed within the Roman empire yet refused to conform to its standards, so the radical Reformation envisaged itself existing parallel to, but not within, its sixteenth-century environment. For Menno Simons, the church was “an assembly of the righteous,” at odds with the world and not a “mixed body”:

In truth, those who merely boast of his name are not the true congregation of Christ. The true congregation of Christ is those who are truly converted, who are born from above of God, who are of a regenerate mind by the operation of the Holy Spirit through the hearing of the Word of God, and have become the children of God.

It will be clear that there are strong parallels with the Donatist view of the church as a holy and pure body (see pp. 358–9), isolated from the corrupting influences of the world and prepared to maintain its purity and distinctiveness by whatever disciplinary means proved necessary.

This notion of the church as a faithful remnant in conflict with the world harmonized with the Anabaptist experience of persecution by the forces of Antichrist, personified in the magistrates. The radical Reformation was generally hostile to the use of coercion and advocated a policy of nonresistance. Jakob Hutter (c.1500–36) gave this apolitical stance a theological justification through an appeal to the example of Christ: “As all can see, we have no physical weapons, such as spears or muskets. We wish to show, by our words and deeds, that we are true followers of Christ.” Hans Denck (1495–1527) appealed to the meekness of Christ, and his silence before his accusers, in declaring that “force is not an attribute of God.”

The clearest statement of the general Anabaptist attitude toward secular authority may be found in the Schleitheim Confession (1527), the sixth and seventh articles of which explain and justify the policy of noninvolvement in secular affairs and nonresistance to secular authorities. Coercion has its place “outside the perfection of Christ” (that is, outside the radical community); inside that community, physical force has no place:

The sword is ordained of God outside the perfection of Christ. [...] It is not appropriate for a Christian to serve as a magistrate, for the following reasons. The government magistracy is according to the flesh, but the Christian's is according to the Spirit. Their houses and dwelling places are in this world, but the Christian's is in heaven; their citizenship is of this world, but the Christian's is in heaven; the weapons of their war and conflict are physical, and against the flesh, whereas the Christian's weapons are spiritual, against the fortification of the devil. The worldlings are armed with steel and iron, but the Christian is armed with the armor of God, with truth, righteousness, peace, faith, salvation, and the word of God.

Anabaptism maintained discipline within its communities through “the ban” – a means by which church members could be excluded from Anabaptist congregations. This means of discipline was regarded as essential to the identity of a true church. Part of the Anabaptist case for radical separation from the mainstream churches (a practice which continues to this day among the Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania) was the failure of those churches to maintain proper discipline within their ranks. The Schleitheim Confession grounded its doctrine of the ban on Christ's words, as they are recorded in Matthew 18: 15–20:

The ban shall be used in the case of all those who have given themselves to the Lord, to walk in his commandments, and with all those who are baptized into the one body of Christ and are called brothers or sisters, yet who lapse on occasion, and inadvertently fall into error and sin. Such people shall be admonished twice in secret, and on the third occasion, they shall be disciplined publicly, or banned according to the command of Christ (Matthew 18).

The ban was seen as being a deterrent and remedial in its effects, providing both an incentive for banned individuals to amend their way of life and a disincentive for others to imitate them in their sin. The Polish Racovian Catechism lists five reasons for maintaining rigorous discipline within Anabaptist communities, most of which reflect its policy of radical separation:

1. so that the fallen church member may be healed and brought back into fellowship with the church
2. to deter others from committing the same offense
3. to eliminate scandal and disorder from the church
4. to prevent the word of the Lord falling into disrepute outside the congregation
5. to prevent the glory of the Lord being profaned.

Despite its pastoral intentions, the ban often came to be interpreted harshly, with congregation members often avoiding all social contact (known as “shunning”) with both the banned individual and his or her family.

Christ and the Church: Some Twentieth-Century Themes

The twentieth century has seen renewed interest in the area of ecclesiology, partly on account of the rise of the ecumenical movement (concerned with the promotion of Christian unity) and partly through the enormous stimulus given to this area of theology through the process of renewal and reform initiated by the Second Vatican Council (1962–5), especially the constitution Lumen Gentium (“A Light to the Gentiles” – note that authoritative Catholic conciliar and papal statements are generally referred to by their opening words in Latin). We shall consider the teaching of this Council presently.

A convenient means of grouping together some themes in twentieth-century ecclesiology is to consider the maxim of the first-century writer Ignatius of Antioch (c.35–c.110), who declared that “Where Christ is, there is also the Catholic church.” This memorable aphorism has had a deep impact on ecclesiological reflection – whether Protestant, Catholic, or Orthodox – throughout Christian history. In what follows, we shall explore three different twentieth-century ways of approaching this aphorism.

Christ is Present Sacramentally

One of the most distinctive contributions of the Second Vatican Council to the development of ecclesiology is its assertion of the sacramental character of the church. As Lumen Gentium puts it, “the church, in Christ, is a kind of sacrament – a sign and instrument, that is, of communion with God and of unity among all human beings.” The Council did not suggest that the church is a sacrament; the traditional sevenfold understanding of the sacraments (see pp. 384–5) is retained. Rather, the church is “like a sacrament.” In making this statement, the Council seems to have been attempting to bring together the idea of the church as constituted by the Word of God, on the one hand, and as being a visible entity, on the other. This idea is certainly present in Augustine's concept of sacraments as “visible words.”

The idea of the church as sacrament has had a major impact on Catholic ecclesiology in the twentieth century. Even before the Second Vatican Council, such ideas were gaining momentum within the church. In part, this reflects the rise of a “theology of retrieval,” which sought to reappropriate a series of seminal themes from earlier periods in Christian history (most notably the patristic period) which had adopted understandings of the nature of the church which contrasted sharply with the more institutional conceptions which had gained the ascendancy since the sixteenth century.

This view can be seen clearly in the writings of Henri de Lubac (1896–1991), a pre-Second Vatican Council theologian noted for his magisterial grasp of the patristic heritage. In his important work Catholicism (1950), he wrote:

If Christ is the sacrament of God, the church is for us the sacrament of Christ; she represents him, in the full and ancient sense of the term, she really makes him present. She not only carries on his work, but she is his very continuation, in a sense far more real than in which it can be said that any human institution is its founder's continuation.

Although retaining an institutional understanding of the church, de Lubac gave a new sense of identity and purpose to Catholic conceptions of the church: the church is there to make Jesus Christ present to the world. Ignatius's aphorism is therefore given new significance through this sacramental understanding of the role of the church.

The idea caught on. In 1953, the German Jesuit theologian Otto Semmelroth (1912–79) published a highly influential study entitled The Church as Primordial Sacrament, in which he argued for the church as the “primordial sacrament” (Ursakrament), which demonstrates God's ability to use the material order to bear witness to the spiritual. The Dominican theologian Edward Schillebeeckx (1914–2009) developed related ideas in his Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (1963). The overall effect of this approach is to integrate the fields of Christology, ecclesiology, and sacramentology into a coherent whole. Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–88) adopted a strongly incarnational approach to his understanding of the church, arguing that the church is the elongetur Christi – the prolongation of Christ in time and space. The Jesuit writer Karl Rahner (1904–84) continued this sacramental understanding of the church, declaring that the church is there to make Christ present in the world in an historical, visible, and embodied form.

Rahner's approach has attracted considerable interest. For Rahner, the church “is the continuance, the contemporary presence of that real, eschatologically triumphant and irrevocably established presence in Christ in the world of God's saving will.” The church is thus a “concrete manifestation of God's salvation of humanity,” the enduring presence of God in the world (an idea anticipated in the sixteenth century in the writings of the Spanish mystic Teresa of Avilà, 1515–82). And, on account of its real historical presence in the world, it follows that it requires structures.

For this reason, Rahner held that it is possible to justify a continuing institutional element in any Catholic understanding of the nature of the church, but he also insisted that these particular structures are not necessarily of defining importance. Furthermore, Rahner was prepared to concede a degree of flexibility in relation to those structures. What may have been appropriate to the definite historical circumstances of the past may not be appropriate today. The church must be free to achieve its sacramental mission in new historical structures.

Schillebeeckx differs from Rahner at some points of importance, most notably in his rejection of Rahner's argument that the church is the “primal sacrament” (an idea, as we noted above, which can be traced back to Otto Semmelroth). For Schillebeeckx, Christ must be regarded as that primal sacrament; whatever sacramental character the church possesses must be understood to arise through its relationship with Christ.

Protestant critics of this approach have expressed anxiety about the approach's relative lack of a biblical foundation and its relative lack of a place for a theology of preaching. In view of the importance of this point, we may move on to consider further Protestant interpretations of Ignatius's axiom which focus on the presence of Christ resulting from the preaching of the Word of God.

Christ is Present through the Word

A central theme of Protestant understanding of the nature of the church focuses on the presence of Christ resulting from the proclamation of his Word, in preaching and the sacraments. For example, we have already noted Calvin's view (pp. 361–3) that the preaching of the word and right administration of the sacraments are linked with the presence of Christ – and wherever Christ is, there his church is to be found as well.

This kerygmatic (Greek kerygma, “herald”) theme has continued to be of major importance in the twentieth century, particularly in the writings of Karl Barth (1886–1968). For Barth, the church is the community which comes into being in response to the proclamation of the Word of God. The church is seen as a kerygmatic community which proclaims the good news of what God has done for humanity in Christ, and which comes into being wherever the Word of God is faithfully proclaimed and accepted. As Barth put it in his 1948 address to the World Council of Churches, the church consists of “the gathering together [congregatio] of those men and women [fidelium] whom the living Lord Jesus Christ chooses and calls to be witnesses of the victory he has already won, and heralds of its future manifestation.” Barth's ecclesiology is thoroughly trinitarian at this point, involving Father, Son, and Spirit in a dynamic understanding of the nature of the church. For Barth, the church is not an extension of Christ but is united with Christ, and called and commissioned by him to serve the world. Christ is present within his church, through the Holy Spirit.

The role of the Holy Spirit is particularly important. Although it would not be correct to say that Barth has a “charismatic” understanding of the church, his Christological approach to the identity of the church allocates a definite and distinctive role to the Holy Spirit, which Barth summarized as follows in his Dogmatics in Outline (1947):

Credo ecclesiam [“I believe in the church”] means that I believe that here, at this place, in this assembly, the work of the Holy Spirit takes place. By that is not intended a deification of the creature; the church is not the object of faith, we do not believe in the church; but we do believe that in this congregation the work of the Holy Spirit becomes an event.

The church is thus seen as an event, not an institution. Barth does not identify the Holy Spirit with the church, nor limit the operation of the Spirit to the bounds of the institution of the church. He argues that the Spirit empowers and renews the church, unites it with Christ's redemptive work on the cross, and is the means by which the risen Christ is made present to the people of God. In this way, the Spirit safeguards the church from lapsing into purely secular ways of understanding its identity and mission.

Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) also adopted a strongly kerygmatic approach to the nature of the church, linking Barth's emphasis on the foundational role of “proclamation” with the notion of “church as event”:

The word of God and the church are inseparable. The church is constituted by the word of God as the congregation of the elect, and the word of God is not a statement of abstract truths, but a proclamation which is duly authorized and therefore needs bearers with proper credentials (2 Corinthians 5: 18–19). Just as the word of God becomes his word only in event, so the church is really the church only when it too becomes an event.

Christ is Present through the Spirit

A third major theme in twentieth-century ecclesiology has focused on the role of the Holy Spirit as constitutive of the church. Here, Ignatius's aphorism is interpreted in such a way as to emphasize the necessity of the Spirit in actualizing the presence of Christ. We have already seen the importance of this point in relation to Barth's ecclesiology; however, it is present in more developed forms in writers such as the Brazilian Catholic theologian Leonardo Boff (born 1938) and the Orthodox theologian John Zizioulas (born 1931). These two writers interpret their pneumatological (Greek: pneuma, “spirit”) understanding of the church in different ways. Boff remains Christ-centered, despite his emphasis on the Spirit, on account of his strongly western understanding of the Trinity; Zizioulas develops a much more Orthodox approach, based on a Cappadocian understanding of the role of the Spirit within the Godhead.

For Leonardo Boff, one of the leading representatives of liberation theology, the constitutive role of the Holy Spirit in an understanding of the church rests on the fact that it is the Spirit of Jesus Christ. Whereas writers such as Rahner and Balthasar had defended the view that the church was the physical embodiment or “re-presentation” of Christ in the world, Boff defends the view that the church is primarily the spiritual body of Christ and is therefore not confined to any specific existing structures. In this respect, Boff can be seen as mounting a criticism of institutionalized understandings of the church, particularly those that flourished before the Second Vatican Council.

In his Ecclesio genesis: The Base Communities Reinvent the Church (1986), Boff provides a definition of the church which shows some parallels with kerygmatic understandings of the church:

The church comes into being as church when people become aware of the call to salvation in Jesus Christ, come together in community, profess the same faith, celebrate the same eschatological liberation, and seek to live the discipleship of Jesus Christ. We can speak of church in the proper sense only when there is question of this ecclesial consciousness.

For Boff, this “ecclesial consciousness” is the result of the work of the Holy Spirit, whose person and work are inseparable from the risen Christ. Boff interprets the creedal doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son as an affirmation of this point.

In the case of Zizioulas, however, the Holy Spirit is allocated a quite distinct role. Zizioulas points out how, especially in 1 Corinthians 12, Paul appears to allocate a constitutive role within the church to the Holy Spirit. Pneumatology is therefore not about “the well-being of the church [...] it is the very essence of the church.” Zizioulas's distinctive approach could be summarized as follows: the church may have been instituted by Jesus Christ, but it is constituted by the Holy Spirit.

The Second Vatican Council on the Church

The Second Vatican Council introduced a new vitality into the discussion of the doctrine of the church, partly through its reappropriation of biblical imagery relating to the church. Prior to the Council, Catholic writers tended to think of the church in terms of a “perfect society.” This style of imagery dates from the later part of the sixteenth century, and emphasized the institutional credentials of the church, especially in the light of the increasing power of European nation-states. Part of the church's strategy for asserting its independence from the increasing power of the state was to affirm its own identity as a society.

This approach can be seen particularly clearly in the writings of Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621), one of the most important writers of the Catholic Reformation, who argued that the church was as visible and tangible a social reality as “the kingdom of France or the republic of Venice.” This institutional approach to the church dominated Catholic thinking for much of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Thus, the standard edition of the theological textbook of Adolphe Tanquerey (1854–1932) spends some 64 pages demonstrating that the church is (1) an infallible society, (2) a perfect society, (3) a hierarchical society, and (4) a monarchic society. Inevitably, this strongly institutional approach to ecclesiology led to the church being defined primarily in terms of its visible aspects, and particularly its visible structures of government and its codes of belief and conduct. The church was, in effect, modeled on social institutions of the late sixteenth century.

Now we need to be clear that there has always been an institutional aspect to Christian doctrines of the church, whether Protestant or Catholic. Thus, both Luther and Calvin stressed the importance of proper church government. But neither of these reformers regarded the institutional element as being of defining importance. The critical thing was the gospel, not the institution. Similar insights are generally typical of patristic and medieval authors until the fourteenth century. At this point, increasing papal political power and a growing determination to fend off attacks on the institutions of the church (particularly the papacy and hierarchy) led to a growing tendency to defend these institutions by making them integral to a proper understanding of the church.

This tendency is generally thought to have reached its zenith during the nineteenth century. Responding to an increasingly dangerous political situation in Europe, where secularism and anti-Catholicism appeared to be on the increase, the First Vatican Council defined a strongly hierarchical conception of the church, perhaps seen most clearly in the rigid distinction between “the pastors and the flock.”

This general approach to ecclesiology dominated Catholic theology prior to the Second Vatican Council. On this view, the church of Christ is not a community of equals in which all the faithful have the same rights. It is a society of unequals, not only because among the faithful some are clergy and some are laity but also because God's power in the church enables only some to sanctify, teach, and govern and not others. This point was often expressed in terms of the distinction between ecclesia docens (“the teaching church,” referring to the hierarchy) and ecclesia discens (“the learning church,” referring to the laity, whose responsibilities were primarily to respect and obey their superiors).

Yet, by the middle of the twentieth century, Catholic scholars and theologians were expressing increasing misgivings concerning this model. In part, this reflects an awareness of the growing evidence which suggested that the early church did not have a coherent monolithic structure but had at least a degree of flexibility over its institutions and orders. The emergence of a strongly organized and institutional church increasingly came to be seen as dating from after the apostolic period and as being a response partly to political pressures, such as those resulting from the imperial recognition of Christianity under Constantine. The Belgian biblical scholar Lucien Cerfaux (1883–1968) and others paved the way for a recovery of biblical and patristic insights which had been overlooked on account of the trend toward institutionalization. Others, such as Yves Congar (1904–95), worked for the recovery of a theology of the laity, concerned over their marginalization in institutional models of the church. The result was that the Second Vatican Council was in a position to revitalize Catholic thinking on this vital area of theology, with all its implications for ecumenism and evangelism. The results may be seen in the document Lumen Gentium (“A Light to the Gentiles”).

We have already considered the Council's teaching on “the church as sacrament” (p. 364), and the manner in which it has been developed by theologians such as Karl Rahner. In what follows, we shall explore three further aspects of the teaching of the Council on the nature of the church.

The Church as Communion

In 1943, the German Catholic writer Ludwig von Hertling (1892–1980) published a study entitled Communio: Church and Papacy in Early Christianity, which dealt with the importance of the theme of “communion” (often referred to by the Greek term koinonia) for a proper understanding of the nature of the church. This work had a deep influence on the Council's reflections, and its distinctive themes can be found in the final statement on the church. Given the overtones which the term “communion” now possesses, it is perhaps useful to employ the older English word “fellowship” to bring out the point at issue. The basic biblical theme which is expressed by this term is that of sharing in a common life, whether this life is thought of as the life of the Trinity itself or the common life of believers within the church. The term possesses both vertical and horizontal aspects, the former referring to the relationship between the believer and God and the latter to the relationship between individual believers.

The recovery of this biblical idea proved to be a powerful corrective to the purely institutional conceptions of the church which had gained the ascendancy during the nineteenth century. The regulatory enforcement of fellowship was now seen to be one aspect of the more fundamental idea of the fellowship between the believer and God, established through the death and resurrection of Christ and lived out in the life of the church.

The Church as the People of God

Of the various models of the church set forth by the Second Vatican Council, the most important is that of the church as “the people of God.” This is a strongly biblical idea, with deep roots in both Old and New Testaments. The Second Vatican Council is careful to avoid the direct identification of “the people of God” with “the Catholic church,” or the suggestion that the church has somehow displaced Israel as the people of God. Indeed, the second chapter of the Council's text on the inner life of the church describes the church as the “new people of God,” continuous with Israel. The election of the church as the people of God does not entail the rejection of Israel but rather the extension of God's kingdom.

This point is made particularly clearly in the Council's “Declaration on Non-Christian Religions” (1965), which recognizes a special continuing place for Jews in God's purposes of salvation:

The Church of Christ acknowledges that in God's plan of salvation the beginning of her faith and election is to be found in the patriarchs, Moses, and the prophets. She professes that all Christ's faithful, who as men of faith are sons of Abraham (cf. Galatians 3: 7), are included in the same patriarch's call and that the salvation of the Church is mystically prefigured in the exodus of God's chosen people from the land of bondage. On this account the Church cannot forget that she received the revelation of the Old Testament by way of that people with whom God in his inexpressible mercy established the ancient covenant. Nor can she forget that she draws nourishment from that good olive tree onto which the wild olive branches of the Gentiles have been grafted (cf. Romans 11: 17–24). The Church believes that Christ who is our peace has through his cross reconciled Jews and Gentiles and made them one in himself (cf. Ephesians 2: 14–16).

The Church as a Charismatic Community

The Second Vatican Council took place at a time when there was widespread interest in the charismatic movement (see pp. 281, 290). The impact of this development was felt strongly within some quarters of the Catholic church. It led to the Belgian Cardinal Leo-Josef Suenens (1904–96) delivering a powerful appeal to the Council to include reference to this development in its reflections on the nature of the church. Lumen Gentium responded by explicitly recognizing the importance of charismatic gifts within the life of the church. The Council used the term “charism” (Greek: charisma, gift) to refer to such gifts or abilities bestowed upon individuals to fulfill some specific service. This term has a long history of use and does not necessarily imply the kind of “spiritual gifts” (such as speaking in tongues or the gift of healing) specifically associated with the charismatic movement. Nevertheless, the Pauline use of the Greek term charisma clearly includes such gifts, suggesting that the Council was allowing a significant degree of openness to this increasingly important aspect of the twentieth-century Christian experience.

The “Notes” of the Church

A central theme of ecclesiology relates to the four “notes” or “marks” of the church – that is to say, the four defining characteristics of the Christian church, as stated in the creeds of Christendom. These creeds affirm belief in “one holy catholic and apostolic church.” The four adjectives included in this phrase – “one,” “holy,” “catholic,” and “apostolic” – have come to be known as the “notes” or “marks” of the church, and have been of importance to ecclesiological discussion since the fourth century. In what follows, we shall consider each briefly.

One

The unity of the church has been of central importance to Christian thinking on the subject. The World Council of Churches, one of the more important agencies in the modern period to be concerned with Christian unity, defines itself as “a fellowship of churches, which confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior.” Yet that very definition concedes the existence of a plurality of churches – Anglican, Baptist, Catholic, Lutheran, Methodist, Orthodox, Presbyterian, and so on. How can one speak of “one church” when there are so many churches? Or of the “unity” of the church, when it is so clearly disunited at the institutional level?

Two episodes in church history may be noted as being of especial importance in relation to this question. The first relates to North Africa in the third century, when division within the church became a potentially destructive issue. The Decian persecution (250–1) led to many Christians lapsing or abandoning their faith in the face of persecution. Division arose immediately over how these individuals should be treated: did such a lapse mark the end of their faith, or could they be reconciled to the church by penance? Opinions differed sharply, and serious disagreement and tension resulted. (The Donatist controversy, discussed earlier, may be regarded as a development of this unresolved problem, in response to the later Diocletian persecution.)

In his important treatise On the Unity of the Catholic Church (251), written in direct response to the crisis arising from the Decian persecution, Cyprian of Carthage insisted upon the absolute unity of the church, comparing it to the “seamless robe of Christ” which could not be divided because it had been woven from the top throughout. Destroy its unity and its identity was simultaneously devastated.

Anyone who cuts themselves off from the Church and is joined to an adulteress is separated from the promises of the Church, and anyone who leaves the Church of Christ behind cannot benefit from the rewards of Christ. Such people are strangers, outcasts, and enemies. You cannot have God as father unless you have the Church as mother. If any had been able to escape outside Noah's Ark, there might have been a way of escape for those who are outside the church.

There is only one church, and outside its bounds salvation is impossible. Extra ecclesiam nulla salus – “outside the church there is no salvation.” Cyprian was subsequently martyred by the Roman authorities in 258, with the result that his distinctive ideas on unity within the church achieved considerable status within the region. As Cyprian was a local martyr, the respect and veneration attached to his person were easily transferred to his theological ideas. This forced Augustine to give them considerable weight in his own writings on the topic.

The sixteenth-century Reformation also witnessed controversy over this issue. How, asked the critics of the Reformation, could the reformers legitimately break away from the established church, and form breakaway bodies? Surely this was nothing more and nothing less than a violation of the unity of the church? (It must be recalled here that the Reformation took place in western Europe in the early sixteenth century, when the only significant ecclesiastical body in the region was the more or less undivided Catholic church.) As we noted earlier, the reformers' response to this important criticism was to argue that the medieval church had become corrupted to the point at which reformation was inevitable. The medieval church remained, in their view, a Christian church. Yet it was in danger of losing sight of its distinctive identity and vocation, and required reform and renewal. If this could not be achieved from within, it would have to be achieved by breaking away and forming a reformed church outside the flux of medieval Christendom.

Once the principle of breaking away from a parent ecclesiastical body for doctrinal reasons had been established, little could be done to check it. This often led to a cascade of fragmentation within such breakaway bodies. The Church of England broke away from the Catholic church in the sixteenth century; controversy within the Church of England led to an exodus of some of its clergy and people, leading to the formation of the Methodist church; controversy within the Methodist church in the nineteenth century led to the formation of Wesleyan and Calvinist groups, each claiming to be "Methodist." From the sixteenth century onward, it became clear that the classic creedal idea of "one church" could no longer be understood in institutional terms. But was it meant to be understood in this way in the first place? Earlier Christian writers, especially in the first phase of the patristic era, had known this tension and been able to make sense of it.

Faced with this apparent tension between a theoretical belief in “one church” and the brute observable reality of a plurality of churches, Christian writers developed approaches to allow the later observation to be incorporated within the framework of the former. Four major approaches to the issue of the unity of the church may be noted, each of which possesses distinctive strengths and weaknesses.

1. An imperialist approach, which declares that there is only one empirical – that is, observable – church which is entitled to be known and treated as the true church. All others are fraudulent pretenders to this title, or are at best little more than approximations of the real thing. This position was maintained by the Catholic church prior to the Second Vatican Council (1962–5), when it took the important step of recognizing other Christian churches as “separated” Christian brothers and sisters.
2. A Platonic approach, which draws a fundamental distinction between the empirical church (that is, the church as a visible historical reality) and the ideal church. This has found relatively little support in mainstream Christian theology, although some scholars have suggested that some such idea may lie behind Calvin's distinction between the “visible” and “invisible” church. However, this distinction is better interpreted along eschatological lines.
3. An eschatological approach, which suggests that the present disunity of the church will be abolished on the last day. The present situation is temporary and will be resolved at the time of eschatological fulfillment. This understanding lies behind Calvin's distinction between the “visible” and “invisible” churches (pp. 362–3).
4. A biological approach, which likens the historical evolution of the church to the development of the branches of a tree. This image, developed by the eighteenth-century German Pietist writer Nikolaus von Zinzendorf (1700–60) and taken up with enthusiasm by Anglican writers of the following century, allows the different empirical churches (e.g., the Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches) to be seen as possessing an organic unity, despite their institutional differences.

In recent years, many theologians with sympathies for ecumenism (deriving from the Greek word oecumene, “the whole world,” and now generally understood to mean “the movement concerned with the fostering of Christian unity”) have argued that the true basis of the “unity of the church” requires to be recovered, after centuries of distortion. The maxim ubi Christus, ibi ecclesia (“Where Christ is, there is also the catholic church”), which derives from Ignatius of Antioch (see p. 364), is argued to point to the unity of the church lying in Christ, rather than in any historical or cultural factor. Throughout the New Testament, these ecumenical theologians argued, the diversity of local churches is not regarded as compromising the unity of the church. The church already possesses a unity through its common calling from God, which expresses itself in different communities in different cultures and situations. “Unity” must not be understood sociologically or organizationally, but theologically. The Catholic theologian Hans Küng (born 1928) stresses this point in his magisterial study The Church (1967):

The unity of the church is a spiritual entity. It is one and the same God who gathers the scattered from all places and all ages and makes them into one people of God. It is one and the same Christ who through his word and Spirit unites all together in the same bond of fellowship of the same body of Christ. [...] The Church is one, and therefore should be one.

The point that Küng makes is that the unity of the church is grounded in the saving work of God in Christ. This is in no way inconsistent with that one church adapting itself to local cultural conditions, leading to the formation of local churches. As Küng puts it:

The unity of the church presupposes a multiplicity of churches; the various churches do not need to deny their origins or their specific situations; their language, their history, their customs and traditions, their way of life and thought, their personal structure will differ fundamentally, and no one has the right to take this from them. The same thing is not suitable for everyone, at every time, and in every place.

An illustration of this may be provided from Anglicanism, a family of churches which owes its historical origins to the English Reformation. The Thirty-Nine Articles (1563), which established the identity of the movement at that time, do not commit Anglicanism to anything other than an affirmation of the main points of the Christian faith, allowing a considerable degree of freedom in relation to areas of potential division (evident in the nuanced discussion of the highly contentious issue of predestination at article 17). If Anglicanism possesses “essentials,” they are “essentials” that are common to the whole church of God, of which Anglicanism is part. Anglicanism's distinctive features may be argued to lie in its application of the gospel to a specific historical situation – England, and subsequently the British colonies. The American Anglican theologian Louis Weil (born 1935) states this point as follows:

The gospel in Anglicanism is, then, one facet in a vast mosaic. In its essentials, it corresponds to the gospel as it has been proclaimed and believed all over the world. Yet it is also characterized by its particularity as an experience of God's saving work in particular cultures, and is shaped by the insights and limitations of persons who were themselves seeking to live the gospel within a particular context.

This represents an affirmation of the fundamental unity of the Christian church while noting the need for adaptation to local circumstances.

The rapid growth of evangelicalism in the modern church is of considerable importance in relation to the doctrine of the church. Evangelicalism is a worldwide transdenominational movement which is able to coexist within every major denomination in the western church, including the Catholic church. Evangelicalism is not inextricably locked into any specific denominational constituency. An evangelical commitment to a corporate conception of the Christian life does not entail the explicit definition of a theology of the church. Precisely because evangelicalism has no defining or limiting ecclesiology, it can accommodate itself to virtually any form of church order.

This is well illustrated by the history of the movement. Evangelical attitudes are now known to have been deeply embedded within the Italian church during the 1520s and 1530s, with prominent Italian church leaders (including several cardinals) meeting regularly in a number of cities to study Scripture and the writings of the Protestant reformers. No tension was seen between an evangelical spirituality and a Catholic ecclesiology; it was only when the situation was radically politicized in the 1540s through the intrusion of imperial politics into theological debate that evangelicalism came to be seen as a destabilizing influence within the Italian church.

Similar developments are now known to be taking place within the Catholic church in the United States, as an increasing number of members find evangelicalism conducive to their spiritual needs yet do not feel (and are not made to feel) that their espousal of an evangelical spirituality entails abandoning their loyalty to Catholic church structures. The unity of the church is here grounded not in any specific ecclesiastical organizational system but in a common commitment to the evangel – the good news of Jesus Christ.

Holy

Earlier, we noted that the idea of the unity of the church appeared to be fatally compromised by rampant denominationalism. The theoretical unity of the church appeared to be contradicted by the empirical reality, in which the church appeared as divided and fragmented. Precisely the same tension between theory and experience arises through the assertion that the church is “holy” when both the past history and present experience of that institution point to sinfulness on the part of both the church and its members.

How is the theoretical holiness of the church to be reconciled with the sinfulness of Christian believers? The most significant attempt to bring experience into line with theory on this question can be seen in sectarian movements such as Donatism and Anabaptism. Both these movements laid considerable emphasis upon the empirical holiness of church members, leading to the exclusion from the church of members who were deemed to have lapsed from these public standards of sanctity. This rigorist approach seemed to contradict substantial parts of the New Testament, which affirmed the fallibility and forgivability – if the neologism may be excused – of believers. Others have asserted that a distinction may be made between the holiness of the church and the sinfulness of its members. This raises the theoretical difficulty of whether a church can exist without members, and seems to suggest a disembodied church without any real connection with human beings.

A different approach draws upon an eschatological perspective. The church is at present as sinful as its members; nevertheless, it will finally be purified on the last day. “Whenever I have described the church as being without spot or wrinkle, I have not intended to imply that it was like this already, but that it should prepare itself to be like this, at the time when it too will appear in glory” (Augustine of Hippo). For Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), the church will only be “without spot or wrinkle” in “our eternal home, not on the way there.” The church is made up of human beings, who are sinful in this life. As Aquinas remarks, “we would deceive ourselves if we were to say that we have no sin, as 1 John 1: 8 reminds us.”

Probably the most helpful approach to this mark of the church is to explore the meaning of the term “holy” in greater detail. In ordinary English, the term has acquired associations of “morality,” “sanctity,” or “purity,” which often seem to bear little relation to the behavior of fallen human beings. The Hebrew term kadad, which underlies the New Testament concept of “holiness,” has the sense of “being cut off” or “being separated.” There are strong overtones of dedication: to be “holy” is to be set apart for and dedicated to the service of God.

A fundamental element – indeed, perhaps the fundamental element – of the Old Testament idea of holiness is that of “something or someone whom God has set apart.” The New Testament restricts the idea almost entirely to personal holiness. It refers the idea to individuals or communities, declining to pick up the ideas of “holy places” or “holy things” from its Jewish past. It is people, whether as individuals or groups, who can be considered to be holy, not places or objects. People are “holy” in that they are dedicated to God and distinguished from the world on account of their calling by God. A number of theologians have suggested a correlation between the idea of “the church” (the Greek word for which can bear the meaning of “those who are called out”) and “holy” (that is, those who have been separated from the world, on account of their having been called by God).

To speak of the “holiness of the church” is thus primarily to speak of the holiness of the one who called that church and its members. The church has been separated from the world in order to bear witness to the grace and salvation of God. In this sense, there are obvious connections between the church being “holy” and the church being “apostolic.” The term “holy” is theological, not moral, in its connotations, affirming the calling of the church and its members and the hope that the church will one day share in the life and glory of God.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1994) sets out an account of the issues concerning the holiness of the church which emphasizes both the theological foundation and the practical application of this belief:

Christ, holy, innocent, and undefiled, knew nothing of sin, but came only to expiate the sins of the people. The Church, however, clasping sinners to her bosom, at once holy and always in need of purification, follows constantly the path of penance and renewal. All members of the Church, including her ministers, must acknowledge that they are sinners. In everyone, the weeds of sin will still be mixed with the good wheat of the Gospel until the end of time. Hence the Church gathers sinners already caught up in Christ's salvation but still on the way to holiness.

The holiness of the church is here grounded in the person of Christ. Those who are drawn into the church through their quest for holiness begin a journey of transformation, penance, and renewal. But this process is under way, and not complete.

Catholic

In modern English, the term “catholic” is often confused, especially in nonreligious circles, with “(Roman) Catholic.” Although this confusion is understandable, the distinction between “Catholic” and “catholic” must be maintained. It is not only Catholics who are catholic, just as it is not only eastern Orthodox writers who are orthodox in their theology. Indeed, many Protestant churches, more than a little embarrassed by the use of the term “catholic” in the creeds, have replaced it with the less contentious word “universal,” arguing that this brings greater intelligibility to belief in “one holy universal and apostolic church.”

The term “catholic” derives from the Greek phrase kath' holou (“referring to the whole”). The Greek words subsequently morphed into the Latin word catholicus, which came to have the meaning “universal or general.” This sense of the word is retained in the English phrase “catholic taste,” meaning a “wide-ranging taste” rather than a “taste for things that are Catholic.” Older versions of the English Bible often refer to some of the New Testament letters (such as those of James and John) as “catholic epistles,” meaning that they are directed to all Christians (in contrast to those of Paul, which are directed to the needs and situations of individual, identified churches, such as those at Rome or Corinth).

At no point does the New Testament use the term “catholic” to refer to the church as a whole. The New Testament uses the term ekklesia to refer to local churches or worshiping communities, which it nevertheless understands to represent or embody something which transcends that local body. While an individual church is not the church in its totality, it nevertheless shares in that totality. It is this notion of “totality” which is subsequently encapsulated in the term “catholic.” The term was introduced in later centuries in an attempt to bring together central New Testament insights and attach them to a single term. The first known use of the phrase “the catholic church” occurs in the writings of Ignatius of Antioch, who was martyred at Rome around 110: “Where Christ is, there is also the catholic church.” Other writings of the second century use the term to refer to the existence of a universal church alongside local congregations.

The meaning of the term changed fundamentally with the conversion of Constantine in 313. By the end of the fourth century, the term ecclesia catholica (“the catholic church”) had come to mean “the imperial church” – that is, the only legal religion within the Roman empire. Other forms of belief, including Christian beliefs that diverged from the mainstream, were declared to be illegal.

Further expansion of the church in this period contributed to a developing understanding of the term “catholic.” By the beginning of the fifth century, Christianity was firmly established throughout the entire Mediterranean world. In response to this development, the term “catholic” came to be interpreted as “embracing the entire world.”

In terms of its early development, the term “catholic” as applied to the church thus went through three stages of meaning:

1. A universal and all-embracing church, which underlies and undergirds individual local churches. In this sense, the term is descriptive and nonpolemical, pointing to the fact that a local church was the representative of the universal church. There is an obvious correlation here between the notions of “unity” and “catholicity.”

2. A church which is orthodox in its theology. The term now takes on a strongly prescriptive and polemical tone. “Catholicism” is now contrasted with “schism” and “heresy,” by which individuals place themselves outside the boundaries of a doctrinally orthodox church.
3. A church which extends throughout the world. In the first phase of the Christian church, this interpretation of the term would have been implausible, given the localized character of Christianity. However, the strongly missionary character of Christianity (linked, as we shall see, with the idea of “apostolicity”) led to the expansion of the church throughout the civilized world of the Mediterranean. The term thus came to possess a geographical reference, originally absent.

The developed sense of the word is perhaps best seen in the fourth-century catechetical writings of Cyril of Jerusalem. In his 18th catechetical lecture, Cyril teases out a number of senses of the Greek word katholikos:

The church is thus called “catholic” because it is spread throughout the entire inhabited world [oikoumene], from one end to the other, and because it teaches in its totality [katholikos] and without leaving anything out every doctrine which people need to know relating to things visible and invisible, whether in heaven or earth. It is also called “catholic” because it brings to obedience every sort of person – whether rulers or their subjects, the educated or the unlearned. It also makes available a universal [katholikos] remedy and cure to every kind of sin.

There are four senses of the term “catholic” in this short passage:

1. “spread throughout the entire inhabited world”. Here, Cyril notes the geographical sense of the word. The notion of “wholeness” or “universality” is thus understood to mandate the church to spread into every region of the world.

2. “without leaving anything out”. With this phrase, Cyril stresses that the “catholicity” of the church involves the complete proclamation and explanation of the Christian faith. It is an invitation to ensure that the totality of the gospel is preached and taught.
3. “every sort of person”. Cyril here makes an essentially sociological point. The gospel and the church are for all kinds of human beings, irrespective of their race, gender, or social status. We can see here a clear echo of Paul's famous declaration that “there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Galatians 3: 28).
4. “a universal remedy and cure to every kind of sin”. Here, Cyril makes a soteriological statement: the gospel, and the church which proclaims that gospel, can meet every human need and distress. Whatever sins there may be, the church is able to offer an antidote.

The various senses of the term “catholic” are also brought out clearly by Thomas Aquinas in his discussion of the section of the Apostles' Creed dealing with the doctrine of the church. In this analysis, Aquinas singles out three essential aspects of the idea of “catholicity”:

The church is catholic, i.e., universal, first with respect to place, because it is throughout the entire world [per totum mundum], against the Donatists. See Romans 1: 8: “Your faith is proclaimed in all the world”; Mark 16: 15: “Go into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation.” In ancient times, God was known only in Judea, but now throughout the entire world. This church, moreover, has three parts. One is on earth, another is in heaven, and the third is in purgatory. Secondly, the Church is universal with respect to the condition of people, because no one is rejected, whether master or slave, male or female. See Galatians 3: 28: “There is neither male nor female.” Thirdly, it is universal with respect to time. For some have said that the church should last until a certain time, but this is false, because this church began from the time of Abel and will last to the end of the world. See Matthew 28: 20: “And I am with you always, to the close of the age.” And after the close of the age it will remain in heaven.

Note how catholicity is here understood in three modes, in terms of geographical, anthropological, and chronological universality.

As we saw earlier, a fundamental re-examination of the notion of “catholicity” took place at the time of the Reformation. It seemed to many that the catholicity and unity of the church were destroyed simultaneously with the fragmentation of the western European church in the sixteenth century. Protestant writers argued that the essence of catholicity lay, not in church institutions, but in matters of doctrine. The fifth-century writer Vincent of Lérins (died c.445) had defined catholicity in terms of “that which is believed everywhere, at all times, and by all people.” The reformers argued that they remained catholic, despite having broken away from the medieval church, in that they retained the central and universally recognized elements of Christian doctrine. Historical or institutional continuity was secondary to doctrinal fidelity. For this reason, the mainstream Protestant churches insisted they were simultaneously catholic and reformed – that is, maintaining continuity with the apostolic church at the level of teaching, having eliminated spurious nonbiblical practices and beliefs.

The notion of “catholicity” which has come to the fore in recent years, especially in ecumenical discussions subsequent to the Second Vatican Council, is the oldest sense of the term – namely, that of totality. Local churches and particular denominations are to be seen as the manifestations, representations, or embodiments of the one universal church. As Hans Küng states this position:

The catholicity of the church therefore consists in a notion of entirety, based on identity, and resulting in universality. From this it is clear that unity and catholicity go together; if the church is one, it must be universal; if it is universal, it must be one. Unity and catholicity are two interwoven dimensions of one and the same church.

In the twentieth century, increasing attention has also been paid by western theologians to the notions of “catholicity” that have been dominant in the Orthodox churches. This is often expressed using the Russian word Sobornost, which has no exact equivalent in other languages. While the term denotes the general idea of “universality,” it also stresses the unity of believers within the fellowship of the church. The idea, which is developed most fully in the writings of Aleksei S. Khomyakov (1804–60) and Sergei Bulgakov (1871–1944), attempts to do justice to both the distinctiveness of individual members of the church and the overall harmony of its corporate life. This is linked with the notion of “conciliarity” (the Russian word sobor means “a council” or “an assembly”), by which the life of the church is governed in such a way that authority is dispersed among all the faithful, rather than centralized and concentrated in any single quasi-papal figure.

Apostolic

The term “apostolic,” like “catholic,” is not used to refer to the church in the New Testament. Unlike the word “catholic,” this term is restricted to Christian use and is therefore not subject to the kinds of confusion with secular ideas noted in the case of other marks of the church. The fundamental sense of the term is “originating with the apostles” or “having a direct link with the apostles.” It is a reminder that the church is founded on the apostolic witness and testimony.

The term “apostle” requires explanation. Its use in the New Testament suggests that it bears two related meanings:

1. someone who has been commissioned by Christ and charged with the task of preaching the good news of the kingdom
2. someone who was a witness to the risen Christ or to whom Christ revealed himself as risen.

In declaring the church to be “apostolic,” the creeds thus appear to emphasize the historical roots of the gospel, the continuity between the church and Christ through the apostles whom he appointed, and the continuing evangelistic and missionary tasks of the church.

The notion of the “apostolicity” of the church was the subject of considerable discussion within English theological circles from about 1870 to the beginning of the First World War, in 1914. In a series of lectures given at Cambridge University during the academic year 1913–14, H. B. Swete (1835–1917) set out the contours of a biblically informed ecclesiology which made extensive use of the early patristic discussion of the matter. Swete, who was Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge University from 1890 until 1915, set out three basic themes which he regarded as enfolded in the concept of the “apostolicity” of the church: “The Catholic Church is Apostolic in three respects: as planted in the world by the Apostles; as adhering to the teaching of the Apostles; as carrying on the succession of Apostolic ministry.” The first point, according to Swete, can be seen in the New Testament itself, especially the history of the expansion of the church recorded in the Acts of the Apostles:

Before the Ascension our Lord charged the Apostles with the work of preaching the Gospel in Judaea and Samaria and to the uttermost part of the earth. This evangelization of Judaea and Samaria was carried out by the Twelve and their company, as the Acts relate; the Gentile missions, so far as the West was concerned, fell chiefly into other hands. But the mission of St. Paul was undertaken with the full approval of the original Apostolate, and was in fact a fulfilment of a part of their task with which they were themselves not qualified to deal. By agreement and fellowship with St. Paul the Twelve “were enabled to feel that they were in effect carrying out through him that extension of their sphere which it is incredible that they should ever have dismissed from their minds” [H. J. A. Hort]. Thus Gentile Christendom was ultimately of Apostolic planting, even if we limit the Apostolic college to the Twelve. The churches founded by St. Paul and his associates were Apostolic foundations, not only because St. Paul was an Apostle, but because his work was done with the concurrence of the original Apostles.

Having established that the historical origins of the Christian church rest with the apostles, Swete goes on to demonstrate that the teaching of that church was equally apostolic:

The earliest converts, it is noted in Acts, “continued steadfastly in the Apostles' teaching” (Acts 2: 42). On their teaching and the teaching of St. Paul there was built up a tradition, or as the Pastorals put it, a “deposit” was formed, which remained as an abiding treasure of the Church (2 Thessalonians 2: 15; 3: 6). Its substance was known as the “rule of faith,” and found expression in the early creeds. [...] The witness of the Apostolic age was the heritage of the Catholic Church; she claimed all Apostolic teaching as her own, and admitted no other body of truth.

Swete's attention now turned to the question of the type of ministry exercised by the Christian church. Again, his point mingles historical and theological reflection; the ministry entrusted to the church was of apostolic origin:

Besides Apostolic tradition, the Catholic Church possessed also an Apostolic ministry. The orderly devolution of ministerial authority from the Apostolate is a clearly marked principle of the first age. The Seven were chosen by the whole body of the disciples, but on their election they were set before the Apostles, and by them admitted to their office. In the new churches among the Gentiles, elders (presbyters) were appointed by Barnabas and Saul. Later on, at Ephesus and in Crete, in the absence of the Apostle, the ordination of presbyter-bishops and deacons was entrusted by St. Paul to his delegates, Timothy and Titus. Timothy himself had received the gift of ministerial grace through the laying on of the Apostle's hands (2 Timothy 1: 6).

Swete's discussion of this issue can be seen as reflecting the general tenor of late Victorian reflection on this subject. The three criteria of apostolicity which he identified are:

1. planted in the world by the apostles
2. adhering to the teaching of the apostles
3. carrying on the succession of apostolic ministry.

Such ideas were especially influential within the Church of England (where they were of some relevance to debates over ecclesiology resulting from the aftermath of the Oxford Movement of the early nineteenth century) yet would receive acceptance far beyond the English national church.

Yet issues remain unresolved and continue to be debated keenly. For example, is the apostolicity of the church safeguarded institutionally, through historical continuity with the apostolic church? Or can it be safeguarded through replication of these ideas and practices, without necessarily having historical or institutional continuity? The former tends to characterize Catholic and Orthodox thought, the latter Protestant.

Priesthood and Ministry: Some Major Themes

It is impossible to talk about Christian ideas about the nature of the church without exploring questions about the nature of ministry within the church. So what are the main lines of thinking about ministry within the church? In this final section of this chapter, we shall look at some broad themes in Christian thinking about the nature of ministry.

Some readers of this work will be studying theology in order to enter ministry in a Christian denomination. This brief introduction cannot hope to provide details of the theologies of ordination and ministry associated with the major denominations, and you are recommended to consult more specific works for this information. However, what follows is a broad overview of some leading theological themes linked with Christian ministry.

The New Testament does not use secular language of “leadership” (e.g., the Greek term archon) but prefers to speak of “service” or “ministry” (Greek: diakonia), understood as the working of the Holy Spirit through each believer for the common good (1 Corinthians 12: 7; 14: 4) rather than as the preserve of the leading officers of the congregation. It identifies a number of “offices” or “roles” – such as deacons, elders, pastors, apostles, bishops, and evangelists. However, it is difficult to identify an overall framework within which these various roles are located.

Whereas the Old Testament used the term “priest” (Hebrew: kohen) to refer to an official who was set apart from the rest of the community in order to carry out certain duties associated with worship and sacrifice, this specific term is not used to refer to Christian ministers in the New Testament. Rather, the term “priest” is used to refer to Jesus Christ, who is seen as the fulfillment of the Old Testament ideal of a priest (see pp. 251–3) or to the church as a whole exercising a “priestly” ministry. Christians as a group are referred to as “a royal priesthood” (1 Peter 2: 9).

Most New Testament scholars hold that this first period of Christian history is marked by a fluid institutional structure, often adapted to local circumstances and small gatherings of believers. For example, it seems that prominent householders hosted groups of Christians in Corinth and Rome, and may well have presided over Eucharistic meals as an act of hospitality toward their guests. The roles of a “bishop” (Greek: episkopos) and “elder” (Greek: presbyteros) seem to have been largely interchangeable for most of the first century. As Christianity expanded, however, it became clear that a more structured form of ministry was needed. Three possible sources of models of leadership may be noted: the structure of large households, often used as meeting places by early Christians; the “council of elders” of the synagogue, already familiar to many Christians with a Jewish background; and the structure of the Graeco-Roman private religious associations.

By the first decades of the second century, a professional ministry was in the process of emerging, consisting of three main roles: the bishop, the elder, and the deacon. A large congregation would be led by a bishop, assisted by a council of elders and by deacons who served the poor and at the eucharist. This was given further development by Cyprian of Carthage in the third century, who held that a bishop was to be considered as a priest (Latin: sacerdos).

By the fourth century, the western church recognized three “orders” within the church: the “order of the bishops,” the “order of elders,” and the “ministerial order,” consisting of deacons. The laity were seen as a distinct group within the church, and the Latin term ordinatio (“ordination” or “appointment”) came to be used to refer to individual Christians being inducted into various orders of ministry.

Augustine argues that ordination confers some permanent change or “mark” on ministers, so that they retain their status – as, for example, a bishop – even if they no longer actively function in this capacity. In the Middle Ages, ordination was accepted as a sacrament within the church and understood to confer some ontological change in those who were ordained. The Second Vatican Council, for example, spoke of ordination of priests as follows:

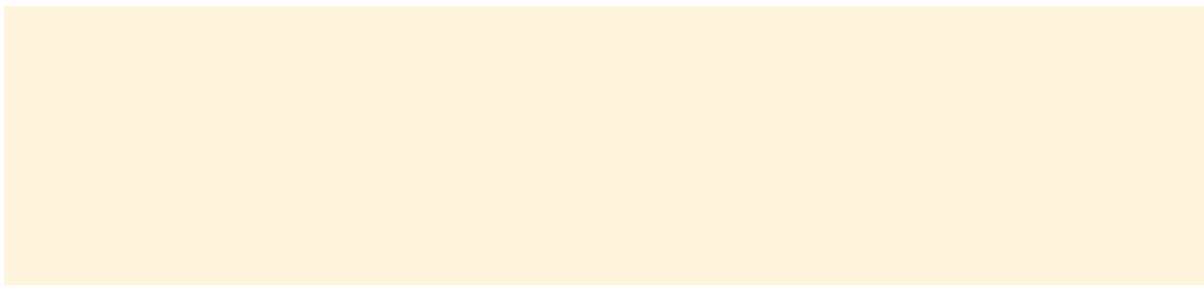

By the imposition of hands and through the words of the consecration, the grace of the Holy Spirit is given, and a sacred character is impressed in such wise that bishops, in an eminent and visible manner, take the place of Christ himself, teacher, shepherd, and priest, and act as his representative.

Although there are considerable variations, Protestant understandings of ministry differ in two significant ways from those of Catholicism. First, Protestantism tends to emphasize the priesthood of all believers – not in the sense of every individual acting as a priest but in the deeper sense of the priestly role of the church being dispersed throughout its membership, including laity. This idea is emphasized by Martin Luther, a leading representative of the early phase of the Protestant Reformation. Citing 1 Peter 2: 9, which refers to believers as “a royal priesthood,” Luther argues that all believers have the status of priests. For the sake of convenience and good order, some are called to have the “office and work of a priest.”

Second, Luther does not accept any idea of ordination resulting in an “ontological change.” For Luther, clergy are “office-holders” who cease to have any distinctive identity once they step down from this role.

The wide readership of this textbook makes it unrealistic to attempt to provide any more detailed analysis of denominational theologies of ministry, which are often very specific. If you are using this book as part of a course leading to ordination, you will be given guidance on further reading in this area by those teaching you.

Having considered aspects of the Christian understanding of the church, we may now turn to a discussion of a related area of theology: the sacraments.

THE SACRAMENTS

In the previous chapter we considered issues relating to the identity of the Christian church. Our attention now turns to a set of related issues centering on the sacraments. As with the doctrine of the church, the issues at stake are of considerable relevance to anyone who is studying theology with a view to entering pastoral ministry. However, they are also of interest to anyone studying theology for more academic reasons.

As will soon become clear, the term “sacrament” proves somewhat difficult to define, given the controversy within the Christian churches upon both the nature and number of the sacraments. In general terms, a sacrament may be thought of as an external rite or sign which in some way conveys grace (see pp. 383–6) to believers and strengthens their faith. While a series of important issues concerning the efficacy of the sacraments were debated during the Donatist controversy (see pp. 386–8), the most sustained debates within the church on the identity and function of the sacraments took place during the sixteenth century. For this reason, the discussion of sacramental theology will include extensive reference to the debates of this era.

The term “sacramentology” is sometimes used to refer to a “theology of the sacraments” but has not secured general acceptance. We shall therefore use the phrase “theology of the sacraments” in this chapter.

The chief debates within Christian history which relate to the sacraments concern the following issues:

1. What is a sacrament?
2. How many sacraments are there?

3. What is the correct name for the sacrament which Christians have variously termed “the mass,” “holy communion,” “the Eucharist,” “the Lord's Supper,” and “the breaking of the bread”?
4. In what sense is Christ present at the Eucharist?

The third question is unanswerable! In practice, it may be noted that the term “mass” tends to have Catholic, and “Lord's Supper” Protestant, connotations. In the present work, the term “Eucharist” has been used as a convenient compromise, simply because it has the advantage of possessing an adjectival form (“eucharistic”). Readers of the work who find this term objectionable or problematic are completely at liberty to substitute their preferred alternatives, wherever these are appropriate. No attempt is being made to prescribe this term as correct or normative.

The Early Development of Sacramental Theology

The New Testament does not make use of the specific term “sacrament.” Instead, we find the Greek word mysterion (which is naturally translated as “mystery”) used to refer to the saving work of God in general. This Greek word is never used to refer to what would now be regarded as a sacrament (e.g., baptism). However, it is clear from what we know of the history of the early church that a connection was made at an early stage between the “mystery” of God's saving work in Christ and the “sacraments” of baptism and the Eucharist.

Perhaps the most significant advances in sacramental theology took place in Roman North Africa during the third and fourth centuries, and are to be seen in the writings of Tertullian (c.160–c.220), Cyprian of Carthage (died 258), and Augustine of Hippo (354–430). It is interesting to ask why these developments are associated with this specific region of the church. One possible factor is that the church in this region was subjected to particularly difficult circumstances, including persecution. (It must be remembered that Cyprian would die as a martyr at the hands of the Roman authorities.) The church in North Africa was thus characterized by a strong sense of solidarity in the face of these difficult conditions. As a result, the African church placed considerable emphasis on the solidarity of the faithful and on the means by which this could be maintained and enhanced. The sacraments were one vital aspect of this strategy, as we shall see.

Tertullian's contribution to the development of sacramental theology can be summarized in terms of three issues:

1. The use of the Latin term sacramentum (now familiar to us in its English form “sacrament”) to translate the Greek word mysterion. It is quite possible that this translation was already familiar to him through existing Latin translations of the New Testament. However, as we saw earlier (p. 304), Tertullian is noted for his ability to invent new Latin words for Greek theological terms, and it is entirely possible that this development was his own idea.
2. The use of the word “sacrament” in the plural. The New Testament spoke of “a mystery” in the singular. As we have just noted, Tertullian translated this as “sacrament,” referring to this mystery – but he also used the term in the plural to refer to the individual sacraments that were linked with this mystery. Tertullian thus uses the Latin word sacramentum in two different, though clearly related, senses: first, to refer to the mystery of God's salvation and, second, to refer to the symbols or rites that were associated with the recollection and appropriation of this salvation in the life of the church.
3. The exploitation of the theological significance of the parallel between sacraments and military oaths. Tertullian pointed out that, in normal Latin use, the word sacramentum meant “a sacred oath,” referring to the oath of allegiance and loyalty to the state that was required of Roman soldiers. Tertullian used this parallel as a means of bringing out the importance of sacraments in relation to Christian commitment and loyalty within the church – an issue of especial significance when the church was under persecution and when loyalty within the church was of paramount importance. This theme is also found in the sacramental theology of the Swiss reformer Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531), as we shall see later (pp. 390–1). For Zwingli, the sacraments emphasize the corporate solidarity of the communion of faith, and believers' solemn responsibilities toward God and the church.

The theology of the sacraments would be developed further by Augustine during the Donatist controversy (see pp. 386–8). A central theme of his reflections is the relationship between a sign and the thing that it signifies. For Augustine, the world contains many signs which point to different realities – for example, smoke as a sign of fire, or words as a sign of that to which they refer. However, there are also “sacred signs” which bridge the gap between God and ourselves, in that they serve as physical doorways or gates to spiritual realities. Augustine uses many definitions of sacraments to express this point; perhaps the most famous of these is the idea of sacraments as “visible forms of invisible grace.” Yet Augustine is clear that sacraments do not merely signify grace; in some way, they evoke or enable what they signify. In one sense, the subsequent development of sacramental theology may be said to concern the way in which the sign and thing signified relate to each other.

We may begin to explore this issue by looking at the question of the definition of a sacrament.

The Definition of a Sacrament

In Chapter 15 we noted that the first centuries of the Christian church were characterized by a relative lack of interest in the doctrine of the church. Much the same can be said in relation to the sacraments. During the second century, some discussions of a general sacramental nature can be found in such writings as the Didache (a short early Christian manual on morals and church practices) and the works of Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202). It was only in the writings of Augustine that issues such as the definition of a sacrament began to be fully addressed.

Augustine is generally regarded as having laid down the broad principles relating to the definition of sacraments. These principles are as follows:

1. A sacrament is a sign. “Signs, when applied to divine things, are called sacraments.”
2. The sign must bear some relation to the thing that is signified. “If sacraments did not bear some resemblance to the things of which they are the sacraments, they would not be sacraments at all.”

These definitions are still imprecise and inadequate. For example, does it follow that every “sign of a sacred thing” is to be regarded as a sacrament? In practice, Augustine understood by “sacraments” a number of things that are no longer regarded as sacramental in character – for example, the creeds and the Lord's prayer. As time passed, it became increasingly clear that the definition of a sacrament simply as “a sign of a sacred thing” was inadequate. It was during the early Middle Ages – the period of sacramental development par excellence – that further clarification took place.

In the first half of the twelfth century, the Paris theologian Hugh of St. Victor (1096–1141) revised Augustine's somewhat imprecise definition of a sacrament as a “sign of a sacred thing” as follows:

Not every sign of a sacred thing can properly be called a sacrament (for the letters in sacred writings, or statues and pictures, are all “signs of sacred things,” but cannot be called sacraments for that reason). [...] Anyone wanting a fuller and better definition of a sacrament can define it as follows: “a sacrament is a physical or material element set before the external senses, representing by likeness, signifying by its institution, and containing by sanctification, some invisible and spiritual grace.”

According to Hugh, there are four essential components to the definition of a sacrament:

1. A “physical or material element,” such as the water of baptism, the bread and wine of the Eucharist, or the oil of extreme unction. (“Extreme unction” is the practice of anointing those who are terminally ill with consecrated olive oil.)
2. A “likeness” to the thing that is signified, so that it can represent the thing signified. Thus, the eucharistic wine can be argued to have a “likeness” to the blood of Christ, allowing it to represent that blood in a sacramental context.
3. Authorization to signify the thing in question. In other words, there must be a good reason for believing that the sign in question is authorized to represent the spiritual reality to which it points. An example – indeed, the primary example – of the “authorization” in question is institution at the hands of Jesus Christ himself.
4. An efficacy, by which the sacrament is capable of conferring the benefits which it signifies to those who partake in it.

This fourth point is of especial importance. In medieval theology, a careful distinction was drawn between the “sacraments of the Old Covenant” (such as circumcision) and the “sacraments of the New Covenant” (such as baptism). The essential distinction which early medieval theologians identified as lying between them is that the sacraments of the Old Covenant merely signified spiritual realities whereas the sacraments of the New Covenant actualized what they signified. The thirteenth-century Franciscan writer Bonaventure (1221–74) made this point as follows, using a medical analogy:

In the Old Law, there were ointments of a kind, but they were figurative and did not heal. The disease was lethal, but the anointings were superficial. [...] Genuinely healing ointments must bring both spiritual anointing and a life-giving power; it was only Christ our Lord who did this, since [...] through his death, the sacraments have the power to bring to life.

However, Hugh of St. Victor's definition of a sacrament still remained unsatisfactory. According to Hugh, the following items were "sacraments": the incarnation, the church, and death. Something was still missing. By this time, there was general agreement within the church that there were seven sacraments: baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, penance, marriage, ordination, and extreme unction. But, by Hugh's definition, penance could not be a sacrament. It contained no material element. Theory and practice were thus seriously out of sync. A resolution of this difficulty became a matter of urgency.

The final touches were put to the definition shortly afterward by Peter Lombard (c.1100–60), who – by omitting one vital aspect of Hugh's definition – was able to bring theory into line with practice. Lombard's achievement was to omit reference to any "physical or material element" in his definition, which takes the following form:

A sacrament bears a likeness to the thing of which it is a sign. "For if sacraments did not have a likeness of the things whose sacraments they are, they would not properly be called sacraments" (Augustine). [...] Something can properly be called a sacrament if it is a sign of the grace of God and a form of invisible grace, so that it bears its image and exists as its cause. Sacraments were therefore instituted for the sake of sanctifying, as well as of signifying. [...] Those things which were instituted for the purpose of signifying alone are nothing more than signs, and are not sacraments, as in the case of the physical sacrifices and ceremonial observances of the Old Law, which were never able to make those who offered them righteous.

This definition is able to accommodate each of the seven sacraments noted above and excludes such things as the creed and the incarnation. As the definition was included in Lombard's widely used and authoritative theological textbook The Four Books of the Sentences (1147–51), it passed into general use in later medieval theology and remained virtually unchallenged until the time of the Reformation.

The Protestant Reformation challenged a number of aspects of contemporary Christian thought, particularly in relation to understandings of the church and the sacraments. In one of his three major reforming treatises of 1520, The Babylonian Captivity of the Church, Martin Luther (1483–1546) launched a major attack on the Catholic understanding of the sacraments. Where the Catholic church recognized seven sacraments, Luther initially recognized three (baptism, Eucharist, penance) and shortly afterward only two (baptism and Eucharist). The transition between these two views can be seen in the Babylonian Captivity itself, and we may pause to examine this change and understand its basis.

Luther's treatise opens with a powerful statement of principle which sets to one side the medieval consensus regarding the sacraments:

To begin with, I must deny that there are seven sacraments, and for the present maintain that there are but three: baptism, penance, and the bread. All three have been subjected to a miserable captivity by the Roman curia, and the church has been robbed of all her liberty.

By the end of the work, however, Luther comes to place considerable emphasis upon the importance of a visible physical sign. Luther signaled this significant change in his views with the following statement:

Yet it has seemed right to restrict the name of sacrament to those promises of God which have signs attached to them. The remainder, not being connected to signs, are merely promises. Hence, strictly speaking, there are only two sacraments in the church of God – baptism and the bread. For only in these two do we find the divinely instituted sign and the promise of the forgiveness of sins.

Penance thus could no longer be considered to have sacramental status, according to Luther, because the two essential characteristics of a sacrament were:

1. the Word of God
2. an outward sacramental sign (such as water in baptism, and bread and wine in the Eucharist).

The only true sacraments of the New Testament church were thus baptism and Eucharist; penance, having no external sign, could no longer be regarded as a sacrament.

Like Luther, the Swiss reformer Huldrych Zwingli had grave misgivings about the word “sacrament” itself. He argued that the term has the basic sense of “oath,” and initially treated the sacraments of baptism and Eucharist (the remaining five sacraments of the Catholic system being rejected) as signs of God's faithfulness to the church and the divine gracious promise of forgiveness. Thus, in 1523 he wrote that the word “sacrament” could be used to refer to those things which “God has instituted, commanded, and ordained with the Word, which is as firm and sure as if God had sworn an oath to this effect.”

However, Zwingli later came to see the sacraments as signifying the allegiance of believers to the church, rather than of God to believers, a point we shall consider at pp. 390–1.

The Council of Trent, reacting to the Protestant approaches to the sacraments, responded by reaffirming the Catholic position outlined by Peter Lombard:

If anyone says that the sacraments of the new law were not all instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, or that there are more or less than seven, namely, baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and marriage, or that any one of these seven is not truly and intrinsically a sacrament, let them be condemned.

This basic position has remained characteristic of Catholic theology since the sixteenth century.

The Donatist Controversy: Sacramental Efficacy

In the previous chapter we noted some of the issues which lay behind the Donatist controversy (pp. 358–60). A central issue, of direct relevance to the material to be considered in this chapter, concerns the personal worthiness or holiness of the minister who administers the sacraments. The Donatists refused to recognize that a traditor – that is to say, a Christian minister whose personal credentials had been compromised or tainted through collaboration with the Roman authorities during the Diocletian persecution – could administer the sacraments. Accordingly, they argued that baptisms, ordinations, and Eucharists administered by such ministers were invalid.

This attitude rested in part upon the authority of Cyprian of Carthage. Cyprian had argued that no true sacraments exist outside the church. Heretical baptism was thus not valid, as heretics did not accept the faith of the church and were thus outside its bounds. Logically unassailable though Cyprian's views may have been, they failed to allow for the situation that arose during the Donatist controversy – that is, ministers who were of orthodox faith but whose personal conduct was held to be unworthy of their calling. Were doctrinally orthodox yet morally inferior ministers entitled to administer the sacraments? And were such sacraments invalid?

Pressing Cyprian's views beyond their apparently intended limits, the Donatists argued that ecclesiastical actions could be regarded as invalid on account of subjective imperfections on the part of the person administering them. The Donatists thus held that those who were baptized or ordained by Catholic priests or bishops who had not joined the Donatist movement required to be rebaptized and reordained at the hands of Donatist ministers. The sacraments derive their validity from the personal qualities of the person who administers them.

This attitude can be seen in a letter written by Petilian, the Donatist bishop of Cirta, to Augustine, criticizing his views on clerical morality. Shortly beforehand, Petilian had circulated a letter to his priests warning against the moral impurity and doctrinal errors of the Catholic church. Augustine's reply did not satisfy Petilian, and led him to write against Augustine in more detail. In this letter, from which Augustine quotes extracts, Petilian sets out fully the Donatist insistence that the validity of the sacraments is totally dependent upon the moral worthiness of those who administer them. Petilian's words are included within quotation marks within Augustine's text.

“What we look for is the conscience” [Petilian] says, “of the one who gives [the sacraments], giving in holiness, to cleanse the conscience of the one who receives. For anyone who knowingly receives ‘faith’ from the faithless does not receive faith, but guilt.” And he will then go on to say: “So how do you test this? For everything consists of an origin” he says, “and a root; if it does not possess something as its head, it is nothing. Nor can anything truly receive a second birth, unless it is born again from good seed.”

Responding to this approach, Augustine argued that Donatism laid excessive emphasis upon the qualities of the human agent and gave insufficient weight to the grace of Jesus Christ. It is, he argued, impossible for fallen human beings to make distinctions concerning who is pure and impure, worthy or unworthy. This view, which is totally consistent with his understanding of the church as a “mixed body” of saints and sinners, holds that the efficacy of a sacrament rests not upon the merits of the individual administering it but upon the merits of the one who instituted the sacraments in the first place – Jesus Christ. The validity of sacraments is independent of the merits of those who administer them.

Having stated this key principle, Augustine qualifies it in an important context. A distinction must be drawn, he argues, between “baptism” and “the right to baptize.” Although baptism is valid, even when administered by those who are heretics or schismatics, this does not mean that the right to baptize is indiscriminately distributed among all peoples. The right to confer baptism exists only within the church, and supremely in those ministers whom it has chosen and authorized to administer the sacraments. The authority to administer the sacraments of Christ was committed by him to the apostles, and through them and their successors the bishops to the ministers of the Catholic church.

The theological issue at stake has come to be represented by two Latin slogans, each reflecting a different understanding of the grounds of the efficacy of the sacraments:

1. Sacraments are efficacious ex opere operantis – literally, “on account of the work of the one who works.” Here, the efficacy of the sacrament is understood to depend primarily on the personal moral qualities of the minister.
2. Sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato – literally, “on account of the work which is done.” Here, the efficacy of the sacrament is understood to depend primarily on the grace of Christ, which the sacraments represent and convey.

The Donatist position is consistent with an ex opere operantis, and Augustine's with an ex opere operato, understanding of sacramental causality. The latter view became normative within the western church and was maintained by the mainstream reformers during the sixteenth century.

The ex opere operato approach to the efficacy of the sacraments was vigorously defended by Pope Innocent III (1160/1–1216) in the late twelfth century. For Innocent, the merits or demerits of the priest are of no consequence in relation to the efficacy of the Eucharist. In the end, the sacraments are grounded in the Word of God, which is not restricted by human weakness or failing:

Nothing more is accomplished by a good priest and nothing less by a wicked priest, because it is accomplished by the word of the creator and not the merit of the priest. Thus the wickedness of the priest does not nullify the effect of the sacrament, just as the sickness of a doctor does not destroy the power of his medicine. Although the “doing of the thing [opus operans]” may be unclean, the “thing which is done [opus operatum]” is nevertheless always clean.

A similar approach was adopted by mainstream Protestant writers during the sixteenth century. The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (1563) state this point clearly:

For those who receive the sacraments which are administered to them by faith and in proper fashion, the effect of Christ's ordinances is not taken away by the wickedness of the minister, nor is the grace of God's gifts diminished. These are effective on account of the institution and promise of Christ, even if they are administered by wicked people.

The Multiple Functions of the Sacraments

In the course of the history of Christian theology, a number of understandings of the role of the sacraments have developed. In what follows, we shall consider the four most significant views of the function of the sacraments. It must be stressed that these are not mutually incompatible. The view that sacraments convey grace is not, for example, inconsistent with the related view that sacraments reassure believers of the promises of God. The debate has tended to center on which of the functions are essential to a right understanding of the sacraments. Most theologians develop overall approaches to the sacraments which incorporate most of these themes, even if they may differ on where emphasis is placed.

Sacraments Convey Grace

We noted earlier the insistence on the part of medieval writers that sacraments convey the grace that they signify. Traces of this view may be found in the late first and early second centuries. Ignatius of Antioch (c.35–c.110) declared that the Eucharist was “the medicine of immortality and an antidote, so that we should not die, but live for ever in Jesus Christ.” The idea is clearly that the Eucharist does not merely signify eternal life but is somehow instrumental in effecting it. The idea was developed subsequently by many writers, especially Ambrose of Milan (c.337–97). Writing in the fourth century, Ambrose argued that in baptism the Holy Spirit “coming upon the font or upon those who are to be baptized, effects the reality of regeneration.”

An important distinction, stemming from Augustine, relates to this point. Augustine distinguishes the sacrament from the “force [virtus] of the sacrament.” The former is merely a sign, whereas the latter produces the effect to which the sign points. It is clear that a major function of the sacraments, in the thought of Augustine and his medieval successors, is that of the efficacious bestowal of grace.

Medieval writers sympathetic to Duns Scotus (1266–1308) argued that it was not strictly proper to speak of the sacraments causing grace. The fourteenth-century writer Peter of Aquila (1300–61) put this point as follows:

When Peter Lombard states that the sacraments effect what they signify, this must not be understood to mean that the sacraments themselves cause grace, in the strict sense of the word. Rather, God effects grace at the presence of the sacraments.

The sacraments are thus seen as causes in the sense of a causa sine qua non – that is, an indispensable precondition – rather than as causes in the stricter sense of the word. The idea that grace is “caused” does not mean that the sacrament effects grace by itself, without reference to God's initiative and action. Catholic theology has always insisted that God is to be seen as the agent, the remote efficient cause, and the final cause of grace (to use the classical categories of causality) in any legitimate theory of sacramental causality.

Such views were rejected by the Protestant reformers, who found themselves embarrassed by Augustine's insistence upon the efficacious nature of the sacraments, especially baptism. Peter Martyr Vermigli (1499–1562) is an example of a sixteenth-century Protestant writer who is critical of Augustine at this point:

Augustine grievously erred in this doctrine, in ascribing too much to baptism. He does not acknowledge that it is merely an outward symbol of regeneration, but holds that, by the very act of being baptized, we are regenerated and adopted, and enter into the family of Christ.

The efficacious nature of the sacraments was reaffirmed by the Council of Trent, which criticized the Protestant tendency (as seen, for example, in Vermigli) to treat sacraments as mere signs, but not causes, of grace:

If anyone says that the sacraments of the new law do not contain the grace that they signify, or that they do not confer that grace upon those who do not place obstacles in its path (as though they were only outward signs of grace or righteousness, received through faith, and certain marks of Christian profession by which believers are, at the human level, distinguished from nonbelievers), let them be condemned.

Trent prefers to speak of the sacraments “conferring” grace (rather than “causing” grace), thus allowing the Scotist position, noted above, to be maintained.

Sacraments Strengthen Faith

This understanding of the role of the sacraments is found throughout Christian history. It became of especial importance during the sixteenth-century Reformation, partly on account of the importance placed by leading Protestant thinkers upon the idea of trust (fiducia) as a defining characteristic of justifying faith. For the first generation of reformers, the sacraments were God's response to human weakness. Knowing our difficulty in receiving and responding to divine promises, the Word of God has been supplemented with visible and tangible signs of the gracious favor. The sacraments represent the promises of God, mediated through objects of the everyday world.

In his Propositions on the Mass (1521), the German Lutheran theologian Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560) stressed that sacraments are primarily a gracious divine accommodation to human weakness. In a series of 65 propositions, Melanchthon put forward what he regarded as a reliable and responsible approach to the place of the sacraments in Christian spirituality. “Signs are the means by which we may be both reminded and reassured of the word of faith.”

In an ideal world, Melanchthon suggests, human beings would be prepared to trust God on the basis of the Word alone. However, one of the weaknesses of fallen human nature is its need for signs (Melanchthon appeals to the Old Testament story of Gideon as he makes this point). For Melanchthon, sacraments are signs: “What some call sacraments, we call signs – or, if you prefer, sacramental signs.” These sacramental signs enhance our trust in God. “In order to mitigate this distrust in the human heart, God has added signs to the word.” Sacraments are thus signs of the grace of God, added to the promises of grace in order to reassure and strengthen the faith of fallen human beings.

Signs do not justify, as the apostle says: “circumcision counts for nothing” (1 Corinthians 7: 19), so that baptism is nothing, and participation in the Lord's Supper [mensa domini] is nothing, but they are testimonies and “seals” of the divine will toward you which give assurance to your conscience if it doubts God's grace or benevolence toward you. [...] The knowledge of signs is very healthful, and I have no idea whether there is anything else that consoles the conscience and strengthens it more effectively than this use of signs. What some call sacraments, we call signs – or, if you prefer, sacramental signs. [...] Those who have compared these signs with symbols or military passwords are to be commended for doing so, because signs were only marks by which those to whom the divine promises pertained could be known.

Luther made a similar point, defining sacraments as “promises with signs attached to them” or “divinely instituted signs and the promise of forgiveness of sins.” Interestingly, Luther used the term “pledge” to emphasize the security-giving character of the Eucharist. The bread and the wine reassure us of the reality of the divine promise of forgiveness, making it easier for us to accept it and, having accepted it, to hold it firmly.

A related view is associated with the revival of sacramental theology within Catholicism during the twentieth century. The resurgence in Catholic interest in the theology of the sacraments can be traced back to the work of the German Benedictine scholar Odo Casel (1886–1948), who wrote extensively on this matter in the period between the two world wars. This interest was developed and sustained by writers such as Karl Rahner (1904–84) and Edward Schillebeeckx (1914–2009), and found its expression at the Second Vatican Council (1962–5). One of the most notable features of the Council's teaching relates to the sacramental understanding of the church, a matter which has been dealt with in more detail elsewhere (pp. 364–6).

The Second Vatican Council also stressed the importance of sacraments in relation to the growth of faith, in terms of both personal commitment and a proper understanding of Christian faith. Christian theology has always recognized a distinction between the act and content of Christian faith. Two Latin phrases are traditionally used to express this distinction, as follows:

1. Fides qua creditur (literally, “the faith by which it is believed”) refers to the act of trust and assent that lies at the heart of Christian belief.
2. Fides quae creditur (“the faith which is believed”) refers to the specific content of Christian faith, expressed in various creeds, confessions, doctrines, and other statements of faith.

For the Second Vatican Council, sacraments sustain and nourish faith in the sense of both fides qua creditur and fides quae creditur:

Because [sacraments] are signs, they also instruct. They not only presuppose faith, but by words and objects they also nourish, strengthen, and express it. That is why they are called “sacraments of faith.” They do indeed confer grace, but in addition the very act of celebrating them most effectively disposes the faithful to receive this grace to their profit, to worship God duly, and to practice charity.

Sacraments Enhance Unity and Commitment within the Church

The unity of the church was a source of major concern during the patristic period, especially as division arose in response to the Decian and Diocletian persecutions. Cyprian of Carthage, as we saw earlier (p. 370), laid considerable emphasis upon the unity of the church, and urged its members to work toward greater harmony within, and commitment to, the church. This point was developed by Augustine, with especial reference to the sacraments. For a society to have any degree of cohesion, there must be some act in which all can share which both demonstrates and enhances unity. “In no religion, whether true or false, can people be held together in association, unless they are gathered together with some common share in some visible signs or sacraments.” Although this point was understood by medieval writers, it found its most forceful expression at the time of the Reformation, especially in the writings of Huldrych Zwingli.

Luther asserted that a central function of the sacraments was to reassure believers that they were truly members of the body of Christ and heirs of the kingdom of God. He developed this point at some length in his 1519 treatise The Blessed Sacrament of the Holy and True Body of Christ, stressing the psychological assurance that it made available to believers:

To receive this sacrament in bread and wine, then, is nothing else than to receive a sure sign of this fellowship and union with Christ and all the saints. It is as if citizens were given a sign, a document, or some other token, to assure them that they are indeed citizens of the city, and members of that particular community. [...] In this sacrament, therefore, we are given a sure sign from God that we are united with Christ and the saints, and have all things in common with them, and that Christ's suffering and life are our own.

This emphasis upon the sacraments as tokens of belonging to the Christian community is, as will become clear presently, perhaps more characteristic of Zwingli than of Luther; nevertheless, it is a significant element of Luther's thought at this point.

For Zwingli, the purpose of the sacraments is primarily to demonstrate that an individual belongs to the community of faith. Baptism represents the public declaration that a child is a member of the household of God. Zwingli pointed out that, in the Old Testament, infant males were circumcised within days of their birth as a sign of their membership of the people of Israel. Circumcision was the rite laid down by the Old Testament covenant to demonstrate that the circumcised child belonged to the covenant community. The child had been born into a community, to which it now belonged – and circumcision was a sign of belonging to this community.

It had been a long-standing tradition within Christian theology to see baptism as the Christian equivalent of circumcision. Developing this idea, Zwingli argued that baptism is the New Testament equivalent of the Old Testament rite of circumcision. It is gentler than circumcision, in that it involves no pain or shedding of blood, and more inclusive, in that it embraces both male and female infants. Further, Zwingli stressed that baptism was the sign of belonging to a community – the church. The fact that the child was not conscious of this belonging was irrelevant: it was a member of the Christian community, and baptism was the public demonstration of this membership. The contrast with Luther on this point will be obvious.

In a similar way, attendance at the Eucharist represents a continuing public declaration of loyalty to the church. Zwingli developed this meaning of the Eucharist with a military analogy drawn from his experience as an army chaplain for the Swiss Confederacy:

If a man sews on a white cross, he proclaims that he wishes to be a confederate. And if he makes the pilgrimage to Nähenfels and gives God praise and thanksgiving for the victory vouchsafed to our forefathers, he testifies that he is a confederate indeed. Similarly, whoever receives the mark of baptism is the one who is resolved to hear what God says to him, to learn the divine precepts, and to live his life in accordance with them. And whoever in the congregation gives thanks to God in the remembrance or supper testifies to the fact that he rejoices in the death of Christ from the depths of his heart, and thanks him for it.

The reference is to the victory of the inhabitants of the Swiss cantons of Glarus, Schwyz, and Uri over the Habsburgs on April 9, 1388, near Nähenfels (also known as Näfels) in the canton of Glarus. This victory is usually regarded as marking the beginning of the Swiss (or Helvetic) Confederation, and it was commemorated by a pilgrimage to the site of the battle on the first Thursday in April.

Zwingli makes two points. First, the Swiss soldier wears a white cross (now incorporated into the Swiss national flag, of course) as a Pflichtszeichen (sign of commitment) demonstrating publicly his allegiance to the Confederacy. Similarly, the Christian demonstrates his allegiance to the church publicly, initially by baptism and subsequently by participating in the Eucharist. Baptism is the “visible entry and sealing into Christ.”

Second, the historical event which brought the Confederacy into being is commemorated as a token of allegiance to that same Confederacy. Similarly, the Christian commemorates the historical event which brought the Christian church into being (the death of Jesus Christ) as a token of his commitment to that church. The Eucharist is thus both a memorial of the historical event leading to the establishment of the Christian church and a public demonstration of the believer's allegiance to that church and its members. This is related to Zwingli's memorialist approach to the Eucharist, which we shall explore further later (p. 400).

Sacraments Reassure us of God's Promises Toward Us

Once more, this function is especially associated with the reformers, who laid particular emphasis upon faith as the human correlative to the promises of God. The reformers were deeply aware of the weakness of fallen human nature, and knew that it required considerable reassurance concerning God's love and commitment. Luther regarded the death of Christ as a token of both the trustworthiness and the enormous price of the grace of God. Luther developed this point by using the idea of a "testament," understood in the sense of a "last will and testament." This point is taken to its full extent in his 1520 work The Babylonian Captivity of the Christian Church:

A testament is, without doubt, a promise made by someone who is about to die, in which a bequest is identified and heirs are appointed. A testament, therefore, involves first, the death of the testator; and second, the promise of an inheritance and the identification of the heirs. [...] Christ testifies concerning his death when he says: "This is my body, which is given, this is my blood, which is poured out" (Luke 22: 19–20). He names and designates the bequest when he says "for the forgiveness of sins" (Matthew 26: 28). And he appoints the heirs when he says "For you (Luke 22: 19–20; 1 Corinthians 11: 24), and for many" (Matthew 26: 28; Mark 14: 24), that is, for those who accept and believe the promise of the testator.

Luther's insight here is that a testament involves promises which become operational only after the death of the person who made those promises in the first place. The liturgy of the Eucharist thus makes three vitally important points:

1. It affirms the promises of grace and forgiveness.
2. It identifies those to whom those promises are made.
3. It declares the death of the one who made those promises.

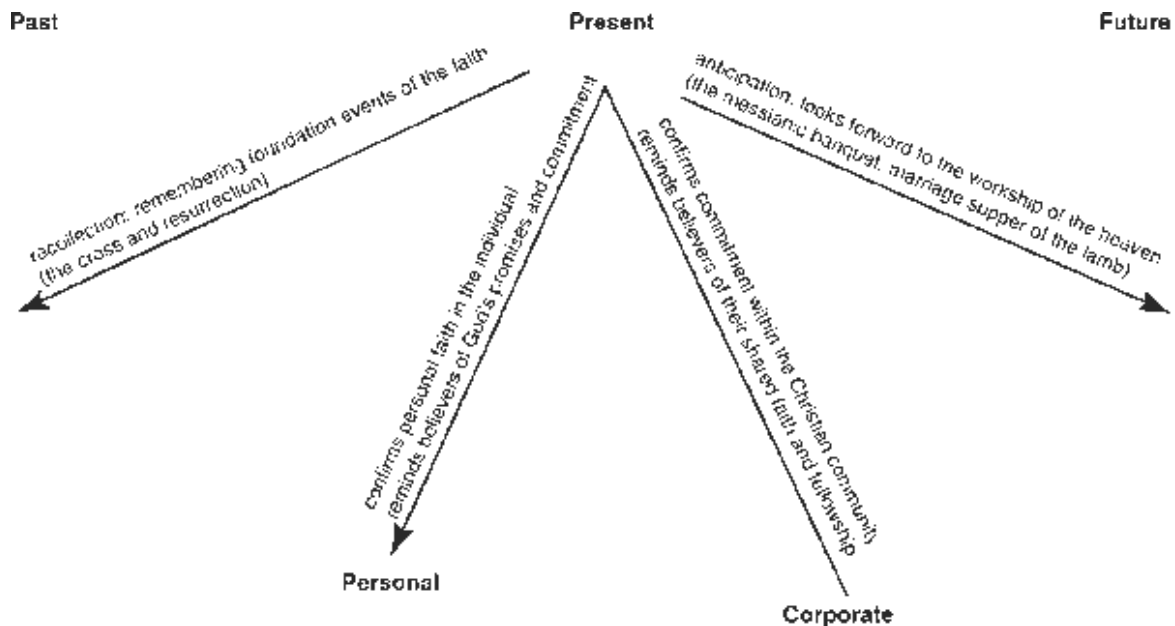

The Eucharist thus dramatically proclaims that the promises of grace and forgiveness are now in effect. It is “a promise of the forgiveness of sins made to us by God, and such a promise as has been confirmed by the death of the son of God.” By proclaiming the death of Christ, the community of faith affirms that the precious promises of forgiveness and eternal life are now effective for those with faith. As Luther puts this point:

So you see that what we call the mass is a promise of the forgiveness of sins, made to us by God, and such a promise as has been confirmed by the death of the Son of God. For a promise and a testament differ only in that a testament involves the death of the one who makes it. A testator is someone who promises and is about to die, while someone who promises (if I may put it thus) is a testator who is not about to die. This testament of Christ is foreshadowed in all the promises of God from the beginning of the world; indeed, whatever value those ancient promises possessed derived totally from this new promise that was to come in Christ. [...] Now God made a testament; therefore, it was necessary that he should die. But God could not die unless he became a human. Thus the incarnation and the death of Christ are both to be understood as being in this one enormously rich word, “testament.”

A Case Study in Complexity: The Functions of the Eucharist

Our discussion in this section has emphasized the many functions of the sacraments. It will be helpful to end this section by exploring the many functions of the Eucharist in Christian thought, integrating some of the themes developed in our discussion to date. The Eucharist – or mass, holy communion, or Lord's Supper – is an action carried out in the present, with past and future dimensions, as can be seen in

Recollection: Looking Backward

First, the Eucharist invites Christians to look backward into the past and recalls the saving acts of God in general and, above all, the cross and resurrection of Christ. The general principle of recalling God's saving acts is firmly established in the Old Testament. For example, many of the psalms (such as Psalm 136) invite Israel to remember God's past actions in delivering the people from Egypt and leading them into the promised land. The basic theme is simple: the God who acted faithfully in the past may be relied upon to do the same in the present and the future.

The recollection of the past also emphasizes the continuity between the church and Israel, the new and old covenants. It has often been pointed out that the Eucharist can be seen (though the parallel is not exact) as the Christian equivalent of the Passover – the great annual Jewish festival recalling the events of the Exodus from Egypt. The Passover festival was celebrated with a meal. According to the synoptic gospels, the “Last Supper” was a Passover meal, suggesting that Jesus wished his followers to make a connection between the past act of delivering Israel from Egypt and the greater act of deliverance that was about to take place.

The central items of the Eucharist are bread and wine, which are held to recollect the breaking of Christ's body and the shedding of his blood on the cross. These items played a central role in the Last Supper. Here is Luke's account of what happened on that occasion (Luke 22: 19–20):

Then [Jesus] took a loaf of bread, and when he had given thanks, he broke it and gave it to them, saying, “This is my body, which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me.” And he did the same with the cup after supper, saying, “This cup that is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood.”

The Eucharist is thus an invitation to look backward, recalling all that God has done. It recalls the great acts of divine redemption in the past, such as Israel's deliverance from captivity in Egypt – but, above all, the death of Jesus Christ, which is recalled by the liturgy, which incorporates biblical accounts of the Last Supper.

Anticipation: Looking Forward

Having invited Christians to look backward in remembrance, the Eucharist then points to the future, inviting Christians to anticipate what has yet to happen. This theme is deeply embedded in the New Testament. For example, Paul's account of the Eucharist makes specific reference to its anticipation of the return of Christ in the future (1 Corinthians 11: 23–6):

For I received from the Lord what I also handed on to you, that the Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took a loaf of bread, and when he had given thanks, he broke it and said, “This is my body that is for you. Do this in remembrance of me.” In the same way he took the cup also, after supper, saying, “This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me.” For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes.

This theme of anticipation is also focused on another biblical theme – the hope of the New Jerusalem. The vision of the New Jerusalem offered by the book of Revelation, the last book in the Christian Bible, speaks of “the marriage supper of the Lamb” (Revelation 19: 9). The reference here is to Jesus Christ as the “lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world” (John 1: 29). It is important to see the Eucharist as a present foretaste of this future event. For this reason, the Second Vatican Council referred to the Eucharist as a “foretaste of the heavenly banquet.” This point is made particularly clearly by Theodore of Mopsuestia (c.350–428), a writer standing within the Antiochene school of biblical interpretation. For Theodore, the Eucharist allows us to glimpse the realities of heaven and anticipate our future presence there:

Every time that the liturgy of this awesome sacrifice is performed, which is the clear image of the heavenly realities, we should imagine that we are in heaven. [...] Faith enables us to picture in our minds those heavenly realities, as we remind ourselves that the same Christ who is now in heaven is [also present] under these symbols. So when faith enables our eyes to contemplate what now takes place, we are brought again to see his death, resurrection, and ascension, which have already taken place for our sakes.

Affirming Individual Faith

We have already seen (pp. 389–90) that sacraments affirm the present faith of individual believers. This process of affirmation takes place through the mind and imagination. The believer, who is located in the present, is able to reflect on what God has done in the past, anticipate what God will do in the future, and deepen his or her faith and trust in God as a consequence.

Affirming Corporate Belonging

As noted earlier (pp. 390–1), sacraments can be regarded as strengthening the mutual commitment and support of members of the Christian community. In a sense, this can be seen as the original meaning of the word sacramentum – a solemn oath of obedience and commitment.

The important point to appreciate in considering all of the functions in this case study is that different theologians place their emphases at different points. Some want to emphasize the Eucharist as a memorial of what God has done in the past. Others want to stress its potential to enhance unity and commitment within the church. Yet all these elements are present; the question concerns which is to be accentuated.

In considering these four aspects of the Eucharist, readers will have noticed that we have not addressed what is possibly the most interesting, and certainly the most debated, of its aspects – namely, the real presence. In what way, if any, does the Eucharist make Christ present to believers? We shall consider the debates over this question in what follows.

The Eucharist: The Question of the Real Presence

The sacraments have never been of purely theoretical importance for Christianity. From the earliest of times, the sacraments have been of central importance to Christian life and worship. This is especially the case with the Eucharist. Even in the New Testament we find reference to the first Christians obeying Jesus Christ's command to remember him through the bread and wine (1 Corinthians 11: 20–7).

It was therefore inevitable and entirely proper that considerable theological attention should be given to the explanation of the meaning of this practice. What did it achieve? And in what way did the eucharistic bread and wine differ from ordinary bread and wine? The words spoken by Jesus Christ over the bread at the Last Supper, and repeated in the liturgy of the church, were clearly of foundational importance.

But what did those words “this is my body” (Matthew 26: 26) mean? The words certainly suggested that Jesus was really present at the breaking of the eucharistic bread – an idea often referred to as “the real presence.” It is this question that we shall consider in the present section of this work. Not only is the question of considerable interest in its own right but it is also of importance in relation to the differences that have emerged within Christianity since the time of the Reformation.

A particularly important witness to the early Christian understanding of the fate of the bread and wine is provided by the “catechetical lectures” of Cyril of Jerusalem (c.313–86). This series of 24 lectures of instruction on the beliefs and practices of the Christian church, given at some point around 350 to those preparing for baptism, is an important witness to the ideas that prevailed in the Jerusalem church around this point. It is clear that Cyril regarded the bread and wine as somehow becoming the body and blood of Christ.

[Jesus Christ] by his own will once changed water into wine at Cana in Galilee. So why should we not believe that he can change wine into blood? [...] We should therefore have full assurance that we are sharing in the body and blood of Christ. For in the type of bread, his body is given to you, and in the type of wine, his blood is given to you, so that by partaking of the body and blood of Christ you may become of one body and one blood with him.

The question of how this transformation took place was of considerable interest to the patristic writers. Most, like the great Greek theologian John of Damascus (c.676–749), writing in the early eighth century, believed that it was sufficient simply to affirm the mystery:

And now you ask how the bread becomes the body of Christ, and the wine and the water become the blood of Christ. I shall tell you. The Holy Spirit comes upon them, and achieves things which surpass every word and thought. [...] Let it be enough for you to understand that this takes place by the Holy Spirit.

Others, however, were inclined to be more speculative, leading to a major controversy over the issue in the western church during the ninth century, to which we now turn.

The Ninth-Century Debates over the Real Presence

The monastery of Corbie in Picardy was the scene for some theological fireworks during the ninth century, focusing on the doctrine of predestination and the nature of the real presence. The two major combatants were Paschasius Radbertus (785–865) and Ratramnus of Corbie (died c.868), who were both monks at this great French monastery during this period. Each wrote a work with the same title – Concerning the Body and Blood of Christ – yet developing very different understandings of the real presence. Radbertus, whose work was completed around 844, developed the idea that the bread and the wine become the body and blood of Christ in reality; Ratramnus, whose work was written shortly afterward, defended the view that they were merely symbols of the body and blood.

Although Radbertus did not offer an explanation of precisely how ordinary bread was transformed into the body of Christ, he was convinced of the physical reality and spiritual importance of the change:

The same Spirit who created the human being Jesus Christ in the womb of the Virgin without any human seed daily creates the flesh and the blood of Christ by his invisible power through the consecration of this sacrament, even though this cannot be understood outwardly by either sight or taste.

Ratramnus was not convinced, and argued along very different lines. The difference between ordinary and consecrated bread lay in the way in which the believer perceived them. The consecrated bread remained bread; however, the believer was enabled to perceive a deeper spiritual meaning as a result of its consecration. The difference thus lies in the believer rather than in the bread:

The bread which, through the ministry of the priest, becomes the body of Christ exhibits one thing externally to human senses, and points to something different inwardly to the minds of believers. Externally, the bread has the same shape, color, and flavor as before; inwardly, however, something very different, something much more precious and excellent, is made known, because something heavenly and divine – that is, the body of Christ – is revealed. This is not perceived or received or consumed by the physical senses, but only in the sight of the believer.

A third approach was also developed at this time. Candidus, a theologian at Fulda, one of the most famous German monasteries of this age, argued that the phrase “this is my body” (Matthew 26: 26) refers to the “body of Christ” in the sense of the Christian church.

The purpose of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is to nourish and bring to perfection the church as the body of Christ.

This is the body which was given for you. He took this body from the mass of humanity, broke it in the passion, and, having broken it, raised it again from the dead. [...] What he took from us, he has now given to us. And you are to “eat” it. That is, you are to make perfect the body of the church, so that it might become the entire, perfect one bread, whose head is Christ.

Medieval Views on the Relationship between “Sign” and “Sacrament”

The development of the doctrine of the sacraments during the Middle Ages gave rise to some technical terms which readers may find it helpful to understand. Although many find it easiest to think of sacraments in terms of the distinction between the “sign” and “what is signified,” medieval theologians developed a triple classification, which we shall consider at this point.

During the twelfth-century theological renaissance, the various aspects of sacraments were clarified by means of a threefold distinction, based on the writings of Augustine of Hippo. In thinking about the Eucharist, it was argued, three different aspects of the sacrament should be distinguished. The scholastics distinguished between the sacramental sign itself (sacramentum tantum), the intermediate effect brought about by the sacrament (res et sacramentum), and the ultimate effect or “fruit” of the sacrament (res tantum). In what follows, we shall explore these distinctions, using the terminology that you are likely to encounter in more technical discussions.

1. The sign itself (sacramentum or sacramentum tantum). This refers to the bread and the wine in the Eucharist. This is the easiest of these three ideas to understand. The basic idea is that a physical element (such as bread) has a capacity to signify and cause something beyond itself.

2. Something that is both a reality and a sign (res et sacramentum). In the case of the Eucharist, this refers to the consecrated bread and wine, which are understood to become the body and blood of Christ. Both the bread and the wine remain present as signs; however, an additional reality (the res, a Latin term meaning “thing”) is now present – the body and blood of Christ – which was not there before.
3. The sacramental reality (res tantum or res sacramenti). This refers to the inward and spiritual grace which results from the sacrament. In the case of the Eucharist, this is understood to be the recipient's participation in the death and resurrection of Christ, and the benefits that this brings. It is important to note that this sacramental reality is to be distinguished from pure signs (bread and wine), on the one hand, and the body and blood of Christ, on the other. The question being asked is not “what do the bread and wine become?” but “what benefits do the body and blood of Christ bring to those who receive them?”

To help us understand this difficult distinction, we may consider how a medieval Eucharist would take place, and the changing status of the bread and wine during the event. What follows is a loose paraphrase of Thomas Aquinas's (c.1225–74) exposition of these concepts in his Summa theologiae (“The Totality of Theology”):

1. Before consecration, the bread and wine are only signs of the body and blood which they will later become. Each is therefore a sacramentum tantum – a mere sign.
2. After the consecration, the “accidents,” or outward appearances, of the bread and wine remain as signs of the reality of the substance of the body and blood of Christ. Yet the body and blood, into which the substance of the bread and wine have now been changed, really are present beneath the outward signs. The bread and wine now fulfill two functions (res et sacramentum): first, at the level of their accidents or outward appearances, they act as an outward sign of the body and blood of Christ; and, second, at the level of “substance” or inward identity, they really are the body and blood of Christ. They therefore act as both sacramental sign and sacramental reality. But this is not the same as the intended ultimate effect of the sacrament. The purpose of the sacrament is not to make Christ physically present but to convey a special grace that results from this – and this is the res tantum, to which we now turn.

3. To appreciate the concept of the res tantum we need to ask what the Eucharist is intended to achieve. What is the goal of the Eucharist? What are its intended outcomes? What is the effect of consuming the bread and wine, both as sacramental sign and sacramental reality? What difference do they make to those who receive them? The res tantum of the Eucharist is communion of the believer with Christ and the pledge of future glory in heaven. Christ is really and truly present in the Eucharist – but his presence is not an end in itself; it is intended to have a transforming effect on the believer. The intended function or final effect of the Eucharist is the union of the members of the church (considered as Christ's mystical body) with Christ (their head) and with each other, and reassurance of the hope of glory in heaven.

The debate over the real presence continued in subsequent theological discussion, particularly during the Middle Ages. The issue became particularly controversial at the time of the Reformation and remains an issue of contention among Christians today. In what follows, we shall outline the three main positions encountered in modern Christianity, and indicate their historical development.

Transubstantiation

We have already noted how Paschasius Radbertus insisted that the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ as a result of their consecration, even though he experienced some difficulty in conceptualizing this change. The doctrine of transubstantiation represents a consolidation and development of this position.

The doctrine was formally defined by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), probably the greatest council to meet before the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. Although the Council did not provide a formal, extended discussion of the process of transubstantiation, it offered a definitive statement of its essential features:

There is one universal church of the faithful, outside of which none can be saved, in which the priest himself is the sacrifice, Jesus Christ, whose body and blood are truly contained under the species of bread and wine, by the bread being changed in substance to the body [transsubstantiat pane in corpus] and the wine to the blood through the divine power.

The Council here used Aristotelian language throughout its discussion – notice the references to “substance” (inner identity) and “species” (outward appearance). Yet clarification of the mechanism of this doctrine was placed upon a much more solid Aristotelian foundation later in the thirteenth century by Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas used Aristotle's distinction between “substance” and “accident” to explain what happened in consecration. The substance of something is its essential nature, whereas its accidents are its outward appearances (its color, shape, smell, and so forth). The theory of transubstantiation affirms that the accidents of the bread and wine (their outward appearance, taste, smell, and so forth) remain unchanged at the moment of consecration, while their substance changes from that of bread and wine to that of the body and blood of Jesus Christ. Aquinas is adamant that the substance of the bread and wine does not remain after consecration; their outward appearance may remain unaltered but their original identity as bread and wine is annihilated.

This approach was heavily criticized by Protestant theologians at the time of the Reformation for introducing Aristotelian ideas into Christian theology. Yet, despite his opposition to Aquinas's statement of the idea of transubstantiation, Luther's own position is somewhat closer to this than many realize. His main criticism of the doctrine of transubstantiation is that it depends upon the use of pagan philosophical categories (namely, Aristotle's ideas of substance and accidents). As we shall see presently, Luther's own approach – widely referred to (but not by Luther himself) as “consubstantiation” – holds that the body and blood of Christ are indeed given along with, or under, the bread and wine. Other Protestant writers, most notably Huldrych Zwingli, were much more critical of the concept.

It was not until 1551 that the Council of Trent finally set forth the positive position of the Catholic church in the “Decree on the Most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist.” Up to this point, Trent had merely criticized the reformers without putting forth a coherent alternative position. This deficiency was now remedied. The Decree opens with a strong affirmation of the real substantial presence of Christ: “After the consecration of the bread and wine, our Lord Jesus Christ is truly, really and substantially contained in the venerable sacrament of the holy Eucharist under the appearance of those physical things.” The Council vigorously defended both the doctrine and the terminology of transubstantiation. “By the consecration of the bread and wine a change is brought about of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood of Christ. This change the holy catholic church properly and appropriately calls transubstantiation.”

Following the Council of Trent, the concept of transubstantiation was regarded as the definitive Catholic position on the matter, and it was not the subject of serious debate within the Catholic church until the 1960s. The doctrine was not without its difficulties, not least in terms of offering a natural illustration of the strongly counterintuitive ideas lying behind it. One of the most interesting defenses of the doctrine stems from the French Catholic philosopher René Descartes (1596–1650). In a letter of 1645, Descartes suggested that the human digestive system offered a natural analogy for transubstantiation. The human body, he argued, was an organic model for the process. Was not the natural process of digestion about the transformation of bread into a human body? No appeal to the miraculous need be made. If the eucharistic transubstantiation requires any kind of miracle, it is in the sense that it implies the assimilation of the bread to the body of Christ without the mediation of the organic functions of the human body. It was an interesting point, but not one that was welcomed by the church authorities of the time.

Transignification and Transfinalization

During the 1960s – a time of considerable theological ferment within Catholicism – the idea of transubstantiation came under critical examination by Catholic theologians such as Edward Schillebeeckx. In response to growing anxiety over the apologetic plausibility of the notion of transubstantiation, two ways of reconceiving the notion were developed. Each, to its supporters, seemed to retain the essential features of the older dogma while responding to the metaphysical skepticism of the era.

The notion of “transfinalization” expresses the idea that consecration alters the end or purpose of the bread and wine. The related notion of “transignification” expresses the idea that consecration is primarily concerned with the change of meaning of the bread and the wine. Both avoid any notion of a mysterious change in the inner identity of the bread and wine – an idea that was thought to be implausible in the increasingly skeptical culture of that age. Transfinalization denotes a fundamental change of the purpose of the bread and wine (e.g., the goal of physical nourishment is replaced with that of spiritual nourishment). Transignification denotes a fundamental change in what the bread and wine signify or point to (e.g., from signifying food into signifying Christ). Both these notions rest upon the assumption that the identity of the bread and wine cannot be isolated from their context or use.

The terms “transignification” and “transfinalization” began to be used extensively during the 1960s, particularly by a group of Belgian Catholic theologians who found themselves ill at ease with the traditional language of “transubstantiation.” In his important study The Eucharist (1968), Edward Schillebeeckx argued that the Aristotelian philosophical framework underlying this notion caused difficulties for many modern people. A new approach was needed, he argued, which would retain the essential theological insights of the Council of Trent without embodying these in an outdated and vulnerable philosophical framework.

Schillebeeckx noted that a growing hostility toward the use of ontological or “physical” interpretations of the Eucharist within Catholic circles after the Second World War was matched by a “rediscovery of the sacramental symbolic activity” – that is, a realization that “the sacraments are first and foremost symbolic acts or activity as signs.” Schillebeeckx suggests that the Italian writer Joseph de Baciocchi gave a new sense of direction to this way of thinking during the 1950s, and introduced the terms “transfunctionalism,” “transfinalization,” and “transignification” to explain the approach he had in mind. After noting the contribution to this way of thinking by writers such as Piet Schoonenberg (1911–99) and Luchesius Smits (1918–2010), Schillebeeckx set out his approach to this issue as follows:

Christ's gift of himself, however, is not ultimately directed towards bread and wine, but towards the faithful. The real presence is intended for believers, but through the medium of and in this gift of bread and wine. In other words, the Lord who gives himself thus is sacramentally present. In this commemorative meal, bread and wine become the subject of a new establishment of meaning, not by men, but by the living Lord in the Church, through which they become the sign of the real presence of Christ giving himself to us.

Schillebeeckx's point is that interpretation of the signification of the eucharistic bread and wine is not arbitrary, nor a human imposition upon them; it is an act of discernment by the church, which it has been authorized to undertake by Christ.

There is, for Schillebeeckx, no need to invoke the notion of a physical change of substance of the bread and wine. Christ's intention was not to alter the metaphysics of the eucharistic elements but to ensure that these pointed to his continuing presence within the church, as the community of the faithful:

Something can be essentially changed without its physical or biological make-up being changed. In relationships between persons, bread acquires a sense quite other than the sense it has for the physicist or the metaphysician, for example. Bread, while remaining physically what it was, can be taken up into an order of significance other than the purely biological. The bread then is other than it was, because its determinate relationship to man plays its part in determining the reality about which we are speaking.

The official response of the Catholic church to these developments was to affirm that they were acceptable, provided that they were upheld within the context of the traditional understanding of transubstantiation. If the bread and the wine were indeed changed in the manner that this traditional teaching affirmed, it followed that both the goal and the signification of the bread and wine were changed as well. In his encyclical Mysterium fidei ("The Mystery of Faith," 1965), Pope Paul VI (1897–1978) stated the point at issue as follows:

As a result of transubstantiation, the species of bread and wine undoubtedly take on a new signification and a new finality, for they are no longer ordinary bread and wine but instead a sign of something sacred and a sign of spiritual food. Yet they take on this new signification, this new finality, precisely because they contain a new "reality." [...] For what now lies beneath the aforementioned species [that is, what is now the new substance of the elements] is not what was there before, but something completely different [...] namely, the body and blood of Christ.

Consubstantiation

This view, especially associated with Martin Luther, insists upon the simultaneous presence of both bread and the body of Christ at one and the same time. There is no change in substance; the substances of bread and the body of Christ are present together. The doctrine of transubstantiation seemed to Luther to be an absurdity, an attempt to rationalize a mystery.

For Luther, the crucial point was that Christ was really present at the Eucharist; Luther was not concerned with any particular theory as to how he was present. He deployed an image borrowed from Origen (c.185–c.254) to make his point: if iron is placed in a fire and heated, it glows, and in that glowing iron both the iron and heat are present. For Luther, it was vastly preferable to use some simple everyday analogy such as this to illustrate the mystery of the presence of Christ at the Eucharist than to rationalize it using some metaphysical subtlety. For Luther, it is not the specific doctrine of transubstantiation that is to be believed but simply that Christ really is present at the Eucharist. This fact, he argued, was far more important than any theory or explanation invoked subsequent to the actuality of that presence.

A Real Absence: Memorialism

The most metaphysically austere understanding of the “real presence” is especially associated with the Swiss Protestant reformer Huldrych Zwingli. For Zwingli, the Eucharist (he preferred to style it “the Remembrance”) is “a memorial of the suffering of Christ, and not a sacrifice.” For reasons which we shall explore below, Zwingli insisted that the words “this is my body” cannot be taken literally, thus eliminating any idea of the “real presence of Christ” at the Eucharist. Just as a man, on setting off on a long journey from home, might give his wife his ring to remember him by until his return, so Christ left his church a token to remember him by until the day on which he returns in glory.

But what of the words “this is my body” (Matthew 26: 26), which had been the cornerstone of traditional Catholic views of the real presence, and which Luther had seized upon in his defense of the real presence? Zwingli argued that “there are innumerable passages in Scripture where the word ‘is’ means ‘signifies.’” The question that must therefore be addressed is whether Christ's words in Matthew 26, "This is my body" can also be taken metaphorically or figuratively. It has already become clear enough that in this context the word "is" cannot be taken literally. Hence it follows that it must be taken metaphorically or figuratively. In the words "This is my body," the word "this" means the bread, and the word "body" means the body which was put to death for us. Therefore the word "is" cannot be taken literally, for the bread is not the body.

Zwingli thus develops a theory of "transignification," in which the bread and the wine change their significance as a result of their location within the eucharistic liturgy. The change is subjective, not objective, lying in the way in which worshipers regard the bread and wine, not in those objects' actual identity. The bread and wine thus become reminders of Christ in his absence and a central focus for the church's expectation that its Lord will one day return. There is no metaphysical difficulty about the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, precisely because there is no presence to discuss.

The Debate Concerning Infant Baptism

The second major sacrament which is virtually universally recognized throughout Christianity is baptism. Perhaps the most important controversy to center upon this sacrament is whether it is legitimate to baptize infants – and, if so, what theological justification may be provided for the practice. It is not clear whether the early church baptized infants. The New Testament includes no specific references to the baptism of infants. However, it does not explicitly forbid the practice, and there are also a number of passages which could be interpreted as condoning it – for example, references to the baptizing of entire households (which would probably have included infants) – at several points (Acts 16: 15, 33; 1 Corinthians 1: 16). Paul treats baptism as a spiritual counterpart to circumcision (Colossians 2: 11–12), suggesting that the parallel may extend to its application to infants.

The practice of baptizing infants of Christian parents – often referred to as “paedobaptism” – appears to have been a response to a number of pressures. It is possible that the parallel with the Jewish rite of circumcision led Christians to devise an equivalent rite of passage for Christian infants. More generally, there seems to have been a pastoral need for Christian parents to celebrate the birth of a child within a believing household. Infant baptism may well have had its origins partly in response to this concern. However, it must be stressed that there is genuine uncertainty concerning both the historical origins and the social or theological causes of the practice.

What can be said is that the practice had become normal, if not universal, by the second or third century, and would exercise considerable influence over a major theological debate: the Pelagian controversy. In the third century, Origen treated infant baptism as a universal practice which he justified on the basis of a universal human need for the grace of Christ. A similar argument would later be deployed by Augustine: in that Christ is the savior of all, it follows that all – including infants – require redemption, which baptism confers, at least in part. Opposition to the practice can be seen in the writings of Tertullian, who argued that the baptism of children should be deferred until such time as they “know Christ.”

In more recent times, infant baptism has been subjected to intense negative scrutiny in the writings of Karl Barth (1886–1968), who directed three major lines of criticism against the practice, as follows:

1. It is without biblical foundation. All the evidence points to infant baptism having become the norm in the postapostolic period, not the period of the New Testament itself.
2. The practice of infant baptism has led to the disastrous assumption that individuals are Christians as a result of their birth. Barth argues that infant baptism devalues the grace of God and reduces Christianity to a purely social phenomenon. There are clear parallels here with the famous idea of “cheap grace,” developed by Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–45), who defined it as

“the preaching of forgiveness without requiring repentance, baptism without church discipline.”

3. The practice of infant baptism weakens the central link between baptism and Christian discipleship. Baptism is a witness to the grace of God and marks the beginning of the human response to this grace. In that infants cannot meaningfully make this response, the theological meaning of baptism is obscured.

While all of Barth's arguments can be countered, they are an impressive witness to a continuing unease within at least some quarters of the mainstream churches over the potential abuse of the practice of infant baptism.

Three major approaches to the question of infant baptism can be discerned within the Christian tradition. In what follows, we shall consider these individually.

Infant Baptism Remits the Guilt of Original Sin

This position owes its origins to Cyprian of Carthage, who declared that infant baptism procured remission of both sinful acts and original sin. The final steps in the theological justification of the practice stem from Augustine of Hippo, in his response to the issues surrounding the Pelagian controversy. Had not the creed laid down that there was “one baptism for the forgiveness of sins?” It therefore followed that infant baptism remitted original sin.

This raised a question of potential difficulty. If original sin was remitted by baptism, why did the infants in question behave in a sinful manner in later life? Augustine met this objection by distinguishing between the guilt and the disease of original sin (see pp. 331–2). Baptism remitted the guilt of original sin but did nothing to get rid of its effects, which could only be eliminated by the continuing work of grace within the believer.

One major implication of this approach relates to the fate of those who die without being baptized, whether in infancy or later in life. If baptism remits the guilt of original sin, people who die without being baptized remain guilty. So what happens to them? Augustine's position demands that such people cannot be saved. Augustine himself certainly held to this belief, and argued forcefully that unbaptized infants were condemned to eternal damnation. However, he conceded that such infants would not have as unpleasant a time in hell as those who lived to adulthood and committed actual sins. Considerations such as these considerably increased apprehension over the idea of hell, as we shall see later (pp. 439–41).

Nevertheless, Augustine's position was modified in the light of popular pressure, apparently based upon a belief that his doctrine was unjust. Peter Lombard argued that unbaptized infants receive only “the penalty of being condemned” and do not receive the more painful “penalty of the senses.” Although they are condemned, that condemnation does not include the experience of the physical pain of hell. This idea is often referred to as “limbo” (from the Latin limbus, “edge” or “boundary”), although this has never become part of the official teaching of any Christian body and is a somewhat vague notion. It is reflected in the description of hell given by Dante Alighieri (1265–1321), which we shall consider later (p. 431). In 2007, the International Theological Commission (a body originally commissioned by Paul VI) reported on the notion of “limbo.” While noting that it remained “a possible theological opinion,” it emphasized that there are “strong grounds for hope that God will save infants when we have not been able to do for them what we would have wished to do, namely, to baptize them into the faith and life of the Church.”

Infant Baptism is Grounded in God's Covenant with the Church

Earlier, we noted how many theologians interpret sacraments as concerned with the affirmation of belonging to a community (see pp. 390–1). A series of Protestant writers have sought to justify the practice of infant baptism by seeing it as a sign of the covenant between God and his people. The baptism of infants inside the church is regarded as a direct counterpart to the Jewish rite of circumcision.

The origins of this approach are to be found with Zwingli. In common with some patristic theologians, particularly within the eastern church, Zwingli regarded the idea of “original guilt” with considerable skepticism. How could an infant be said to be guilty of anything? Guilt implied a degree of moral responsibility which was quite lacking in infants. By rejecting the Augustinian notion of “original guilt,” Zwingli found himself temporarily without any justification for the practice of infant baptism – a practice which he regarded as justified, on the basis of the New Testament. So how was this practice to be justified theoretically?

Zwingli found his answer in the Old Testament, which stipulated that male infants born within the bounds of Israel should have an outward sign of their membership of the people of God. The outward sign in question was circumcision – that is, the removal of the foreskin. Infant baptism was thus to be seen as analogous to circumcision – a sign of belonging to a covenant community (see p. 391). Zwingli argued that the more inclusive and gentle character of Christianity was publicly affirmed by infant baptism. The more inclusive character of Christianity was affirmed by the baptism of both male and female infants; Judaism, in contrast, recognized only the marking of male infants. The more gentle character of the gospel was publicly demonstrated by the absence of pain or the shedding of blood in the sacrament. Christ suffered – in being circumcised himself in addition to his death on the cross – in order that his people need not suffer in this manner.

Infant Baptism is Unjustified

The rise of the radical Reformation in the sixteenth century, and subsequently of Baptist churches in England during the seventeenth century, witnessed a rejection of the traditional practice of baptizing infants. Baptism was to be administered only when an individual showed signs of grace, repentance, or faith. The silence of the New Testament on the matter is to be taken as indicating that there is no biblical warrant for infant baptism whatsoever.

In part, this position rests upon a particular understanding of the function of sacraments in general and baptism in particular. A long-standing debate within the Christian tradition centers on whether sacraments are causative or declarative. In other words, does baptism cause forgiveness of sin? Or does it signify or declare that this forgiveness has already taken place? The practice of “believer’s baptism” rests upon the assumption that baptism represents the public declaration of faith upon the part of a converted individual. Conversion has already occurred; baptism represents the public declaration that this has taken place.

There are parallels between this Baptist position and that of Zwingli, noted above; where they differ is in their interpretation of the event which baptism publicly declares. Zwingli understands the event in question to be birth into a believing community; Baptist writers generally understand it to be the dawn of a personal faith in the life of an individual.

This position is set out succinctly by Benajah Harvey Carroll (1843–1914), a leading figure in Southern Baptist life in the state of Texas. For baptism to be valid, Carroll argued, four requirements must be met:

1. The proper authority – that is, the church – must administer the sacrament.
2. The proper subject – that is, the penitent believer – must receive the sacrament. Carroll insists that conversion precedes baptism.
3. The proper act must be performed: baptism is by total immersion in water.
4. The proper design must be affirmed: baptism is symbolic and can in no way be understood to effect the conversion of the individual who is thus baptized.

This represents a slight development of the criteria laid down by James Robinson Graves (1820–93), probably the most significant intellectual force in the early period of the Southern Baptist Convention. Graves had identified three essential characteristics of baptism: the proper subject (a believing Christian); a proper mode, which is total immersion and baptism in the name of the Trinity; and a proper administrator, who must be “an immersed believer, acting under the authority of a gospel church.”

We have now considered the major theological aspects of the life of the Christian church, including the question of how the church and its sacraments relate to the gospel. However, a cluster of new questions now awaits us. How does the Christian community relate to other communities outside the Christian faith? This question has become of considerable importance as western society acknowledges its multicultural nature. How does the Christian church understand its relationship to non-Christian religions? We shall consider such issues in Chapter 17.

Questions for Chapter 16

1. "A sacrament is a sign of divine things." Why was this early definition eventually realized to be inadequate?
2. Name the seven sacraments recognized by the medieval church.
3. Identify the criteria used by the reformers to reduce the number of the sacraments from seven to two.
4. On what grounds did Zwingli reject the idea of a "real presence" of Christ in the Eucharist?
5. In what way does the concept of "transignification" relate to "transubstantiation?" Can the former be maintained without the latter?
6. Give a brief summary of the main arguments for and against the baptism of infants. Does it make any difference to the infant concerned?

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WORLD RELIGIONS

Christianity is a world religion, having expanded from its origins in Palestine to take root in just about every region of the world. In the course of its expansion, it has encountered other religious traditions and been forced to consider how it relates to them. It is important to remember that Christianity had its origins within the matrix of Judaism and that significant portions of the New Testament are concerned with the clarification of the relationship of the gospel to its Jewish context.

Christians themselves have always been clear that Christianity is continuous with Judaism. The “God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” is identical with the “God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Early Christianity emerged within Judaism, and most of the first converts to the movement were Jews. The New Testament frequently mentions Christians preaching in local synagogues. So similar were the two movements that outside observers, such as the Roman authorities, tended to treat Christianity as a sect within Judaism rather than as a new movement with a distinct identity.

The emphasis on the continuity between Christianity and Judaism raised a number of serious difficulties for the early Christians. First, there was the question of the role of the Jewish Law in the Christian life. Did the traditional rites and customs of Judaism have any continuing place in the Christian church? There is evidence that this issue was of particular importance during the fifth and sixth decades, when non-Jewish converts to Christianity came under pressure from Jewish Christians to maintain such rites and customs. The issue of circumcision was particularly sensitive, with Gentile converts to Christianity often being pressed to become circumcised, in accordance with the Jewish Law.

But, as Christianity expanded, it encountered other faith systems with which it had no obvious historical or cultural connection. What about its relationship to the mystery religions? To Gnosticism? And, as its expansion continued, to Islam? To Hinduism? To African indigenous religions? To the various forms of Buddhism? To study the history of Christian theology is to observe the increasing importance of these questions. Indeed, it is fair to suggest that the serious discussion of such issues within the western theological tradition dates from as late as the eighteenth century.

Surprisingly little attention was paid to these issues in the theological literature of the Middle Ages and Reformation periods. There are clear indications that individual writers were aware of the issues. Peter Abelard (1079–1142) wrote of “pagan saints” such as Job, Noah, and Enoch. Pope Gregory VII (c.1020–85) conceded that there was a possibility that Muslims who obeyed the Qu’ran might find salvation in the bosom of Abraham. Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), who was well aware of the importance of Jewish and Islamic philosophies at the University of Paris in the thirteenth century, developed the notion of “implicit faith” and the “baptism of desire” for those who have not yet heard the gospel but would have embraced it if they had. Yet the issue did not attract as much serious reflection as we might expect.

In part, this was due to the rise of Christendom. Western Europe, which was the stronghold for most of the world's Christian population from about 1000 to 1800, tended to be a set of uniformly Christian societies with little experience of religious diversity. An important exception was medieval Spain, in which Christian, Jewish, and Islamic populations coexisted, not always peaceably, until 1492. With only a few exceptions, western theology simply did not see the question of other religions as significant over the period 1000–1800. Two developments brought about a change of perception.

First, western colonial expansion led to first-hand encounters between Christianity and other religions, especially in southeast Asia and Africa. An excellent example is provided by the British occupation of India, which led to the foundation of schools and universities designed to raise the levels of literacy. British theologians who taught there, especially during the nineteenth century, found themselves having to wrestle with issues arising from the cultural dominance of Hinduism, which had no parallel in any western society. How could this be accommodated within a Christian perspective?

Second, immigration to the west from regions in which Hinduism and Islam were culturally dominant became socially significant in the period after the Second World War. The growing presence of non-Christian communities in the west once more raised the profile of the question of how Christianity understood these faith communities. The philosopher of religion John Hick (1922–2012), for example, has described how the development of his distinctive theory of religions was catalyzed by his personal friendships with members of other faiths in Birmingham, England's second city.

Western Pluralism and the Question of Other Religions

The Christian proclamation has always taken place in a pluralist world, in competition with rival religious and intellectual convictions. The emergence of the gospel within the matrix of Judaism, the expansion of the gospel in a Hellenistic milieu, the early Christian expansion in pagan Rome, the establishment of the Mar Thoma church in southeast India – all of these are examples of situations in which Christian apologists and theologians, not to mention ordinary Christian believers, have been aware that there are alternatives to Christianity on offer and have had to make appropriate responses to this situation.

It is quite possible that most North American and western European Christians of the late nineteenth or early twentieth centuries, unfamiliar with the religious diversity of the world, had little idea of the importance of these issues. For such people, “different religions” would probably have been understood to refer simply to the age-old tension between Protestantism and Catholicism. Virtually nothing was known of the great religions of the east. That would change when the German orientalist Max Müller (1823–1900) published his great series The Sacred Books of the East, the first volume of which appeared in 1875.

Yet things changed radically in the west during the second half of the twentieth century. The western seaboard of the United States and Canada and many cities in Australia experienced an influx of peoples of eastern faiths, especially those originating from a Chinese context. Immigration from the Indian subcontinent has changed the situation irreversibly within Britain, with Hinduism and Islam becoming the foci of identity for ethnic minorities, just as the social shape of France has been significantly changed by the new presence of Islam through emigration from its former North African colonies. As a result, western theologians (who still seem to dominate global discussion of such issues) have become increasingly aware of issues which are routine facts of everyday life for Christians in many parts of the world. The result is that providing a theological account of the relation of Christianity to other religions has become of major significance in the modern world.

Two fundamentally different styles of approach to the study of religions may be adopted, each of which can be readily discerned in modern western academia.

The Detached Approach

The detached approach seeks to give an account of the religions, Christianity included, from the standpoint of philosophy or the social sciences, or from a loosely “religious” perspective (as in many modern American “faculties of religion”). An excellent example of this approach may be found in Anthony Giddens's (born 1938) highly influential textbook Sociology (1989), which approached religious matters from a sociological standpoint. His approach is instructive; for example, he gives four illustrations of what religion is not, in order to indicate the extent to which western cultural bias can creep into thinking about religions. According to Giddens, who writes from a sociological perspective, religion is not:

1. to be identified with monotheism
2. to be identified with moral prescriptions
3. necessarily concerned with explanations of the world
4. to be identified with the supernatural.

Giddens's comments in relation to the too-easy identification of religion with monotheism are of considerable interest:

Religion should not be identified with monotheism (belief in one God). Nietzsche's thesis of the "death of God" was strongly ethnocentric, relating only to western religious ideas. Most religions involve many deities. [...] In certain religions, there are no gods at all.

Giddens's concern as a sociologist is simply to document the phenomenon of religion, without imposing a restrictive interpretive framework upon it.

The Committed Approach

The committed approach seeks to give an account of the origins and functions of religions from an explicitly Christian perspective. It is this approach that particularly concerns us in this volume, which deals with a specifically Christian theology rather than theories about religion in general.

However, the importance of the question of religions in modern culture is such that it is entirely proper to open this discussion by considering some "detached" approaches to the world religions before moving on to consider more explicitly Christian approaches.

Approaches to Religions

Addressing the theme of "Christianity and other religions" immediately raises the question of how religion is to be defined. This question is made substantially more problematical on account of the fact that no universally accepted definition has emerged. A number of significantly different understandings of the nature of religion, each claiming to be “scientific” or “objective,” emerged during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Certain of these attempts (most notably those of Karl Marx, 1818–83, Sigmund Freud, 1856–1939, and Emile Durkheim, 1858–1917) have been strongly reductionist, generally reflecting the personal or institutional agendas of those who developed them. These reductive approaches have been subjected to severe criticism by writers such as Mircea Eliade (see p. 413), on account of their obvious inadequacies.

Thomas Luckmann's (born 1927) The Invisible Religion (1967) was probably the last major contribution to the sociology of religion to use the word “religion” in a Durkheimian manner to denote “beliefs with no super-empirical or supernatural reference”; the term “religion” has now generally been accepted by many writers to refer to “beliefs and practices with a supernatural referent.” However, as the comments of Anthony Giddens make clear (see previous section), this is by no means universally accepted, especially among sociologists with a vested interest in treating religions as a social phenomenon and human construction.

It must be stressed that definitions of religion are rarely neutral but are often generated to favor beliefs and institutions with which one is in sympathy and penalize those to which one is hostile. Definitions of religions show a marked tendency to depend on the particular purposes and prejudices of individual scholars. Thus, a writer who has a particular concern to show that all religions give access to the same divine reality will develop a definition of religion which embodies this belief (e.g., the famous definition of religion by F. Max Mueller, 1823–1900, as “a disposition which enables men to apprehend the Infinite under different names and disguises”). A similar agenda underlies more recent writings which are committed to the view that all religions are simply local culturally conditioned responses to the same basic transcendent ultimate.

Such attempts often rest on what might be considered an excessive reliance upon an outdated Kantian distinction between “phenomena” and “noumena,” with the various religions corresponding to the former and “ultimate reality” to the latter. This distinction has been challenged by the rise of the type of holistic linguistic interpretive approach found in the writings of philosophers such as Donald Davidson (1917–2003), raising serious doubts concerning the coherence of the Kantian viewpoint when applied to the case of religions.

Writers specializing in fieldwork anthropology (such as E. E. Evans-Pritchard, 1902–73, and Clifford E. Geertz, 1926–2006) have offered more complex and reflective models of religion. A major debate within contemporary anthropology and sociology of religion concerns whether religion is to be defined “functionally” (religion has to do with certain social or personal functions of ideas and rituals) or “substantially” (religion has to do with certain beliefs concerning divine or spiritual beings). Despite widespread differences in terminology (many writers disagreeing over how appropriate it is to use key terms such as “supernatural,” “spiritual,” and “mystical”), there appears to be at least some measure of genuine agreement that religion, however conceived, in some way involves belief and behavior linked with a supernatural realm of divine or spiritual beings.

In what follows, we shall consider a number of major approaches to the religions of the world. Some are secular; others are explicitly Christian in their orientation. We begin by considering the views that emerged at the time of the Enlightenment.

The Enlightenment: Religions as a Corruption of the Original Religion of Nature

The Enlightenment witnessed the birth of the idea that religion was fundamentally a corruption of a primeval rational worldview, engineered by priests as a means of enhancing and preserving their positions within society. In his True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678), the Deist writer Ralph Cudworth (1617–88) argued that all religions were ultimately based upon a common ethical monotheism – a simple religion of nature, basically ethical in character and devoid of all the arbitrary doctrines and religious rites of Christianity or Judaism. The primordial rational religion of nature had become corrupted through its early interpreters. This approach is also found in Matthew Tindal's (1657–1733) highly influential work Christianity as Old as Creation, or, The Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature (1730). On the basis of the foundational Enlightenment assumption of the rationality of reality and the ability of human beings to uncover and apprehend this rationality, it was argued that whatever lay behind the various world religions was ultimately rational in character and thus capable of being uncovered, described, and analyzed by human reason.

The idea of a universal rational religion was, however, at odds with the diversity of the world religions. As European knowledge of these religions deepened, through the growth of the genre of “voyager literature” and through the increasing availability of Chinese, Indian, Persian, and Vedic religious writings, it became increasingly clear that the notion of a universal religion of reason faced difficulties when confronted with the evidence of the astonishing variety of human religious beliefs and practices. Many Enlightenment writers, perhaps more concerned with championing reason than with wrestling with the empirical evidence, developed a theory of religion which accounted for this diversity, at least in part.

The theory that gained an especially wide hearing was that the various world religions were little more than the inventions of cultic leaders or priests, whose main motivation was the preservation of their own interests and status. The Roman historian Tacitus (56–c.120) had suggested that Moses invented the Jewish religious rites as a means of ensuring religious cohesion after the expulsion from Egypt; many writers of the early Enlightenment developed this notion, arguing that the variety of human religious rites and practices were simply human inventions in response to specific historical situations, now firmly in the past. The way was open to the recovery of the universal primordial religion of nature, which would put an end to the religious squabbles of humanity.

The idea of “superstition” emerged as significant at this time, often becoming pejoratively synonymous with “religion.” In his Natural History of Superstition (1709), John Trenchard (1662–1723) developed the idea of the inherent credulity of humanity, which permitted natural monotheism to degenerate into the various religious traditions of humanity. The enthusiasm with which this idea was received can be judged from the comments of the Independent Whig (December 31, 1720), to the effect that “the peculiar Foible of Mankind is Superstition, or an intrinsick and pannick Fear of invisible and unknown Beings.”

For Trenchard, the religions represented the triumph of superstition over reason. By eliminating such superstitious beliefs and rites, a return to the universal and simple religion of nature could be achieved. A similar idea was developed during the French Enlightenment by Paul Henri Thiry (1723–89), Baron d'Holbach, who argued that religion was little more than a form of pathological disorder. The French Revolution had seemed set to eliminate this disorder; its total failure to do so raised awkward questions for the general Enlightenment approach to religions. For this reason, the approach adopted by Ludwig Feuerbach seemed to offer new possibilities for those disaffected as a result of the European religious situation at the time.

Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72): Religion as an Objectification of Human Feeling

In the foreword to the first edition of his The Essence of Christianity (1841), Ludwig Feuerbach states that the purpose of his work is “to show that the supernatural mysteries of religion are based upon quite simple natural truths.” The leading idea of the work is deceptively simple: human beings have created their own gods and religions, which embody their own idealized conception of their aspirations, needs, and fears. We have already considered some aspects of Feuerbach's approach (see pp. 133–4); it now demands to be treated in more detail.

It is not correct to suggest that Feuerbach merely reduces the divine to the natural. The permanent significance of Feuerbach's work lies in its detailed analysis of the means by which religious concepts arise within the human consciousness. The thesis that human beings create the gods in their own image is but the conclusion of a radical and penetrating critique of concept-formation in religion, based on the Hegelian concepts of "self-alienation" and "self-objectification."

The Hegelian analysis of consciousness requires that there be a formal relationship between subject and object. The concept of "consciousness" cannot be isolated as an abstract idea, in that it is necessarily linked with an object: to be "conscious" is to be conscious of something. Human consciousness of feelings, such as fear or love, leads to their objectification and thus to externalization of these feelings. Divine predicates are thus for Feuerbach recognized to be human predicates:

Consciousness of God is human self-consciousness; knowledge of God is human self-knowledge. By the God you know the human, and conversely, by the human, you know the God. The two are one. [...] What an earlier religion took to be objective, is later recognized to be subjective; what formerly was taken to be God, and worshiped as such, is now recognized to be something human. What was earlier religion is later taken to be idolatry: humans are seen to have adored their own nature. Humans objectified themselves but failed to recognize themselves as this object. The later religion takes this step; every advance in religion is therefore a deepening in self-knowledge.

It is obvious that Feuerbach tends to use the terms "Christianity" and "religion" interchangeably throughout The Essence of Christianity, thus glossing over the fact that his theory has some difficulty in accounting for nontheistic religions. Nevertheless, it is clear that his reduction of Christian theology to anthropology is of considerable significance.

The most important epistemological analysis in The Essence of Christianity is concerned with the role of feeling in the process of religious concept-formation, and has important consequences for the approach centered on “religious feeling” characteristic of F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) and the later liberal tradition. For Feuerbach, Christian theology has tended to interpret the externalized image of “feeling” or self-consciousness as a wholly other, absolute essence, whereas in fact it is a “self-feeling feeling”: human religious feelings or experience cannot be interpreted as an awareness of God – only as a misunderstood self-awareness. “If feeling is the essential instrumentality or organ of religion, then God's nature is nothing other than an expression of the nature of feeling. [...] The divine essence, which is comprehended by feeling, is actually nothing other than the essence of feeling, enraptured and delighted with itself – nothing but self-intoxicated, self-contented feeling.”

Important though Feuerbach's analysis may have been, it was overshadowed by that of Karl Marx, to which we now turn.

Karl Marx: Religion as the Product of Socioeconomic Alienation

In his 1844 political and economic manuscripts, the left-wing Hegelian political thinker Karl Marx (1818–83) developed an approach to religion which rests upon ideas that clearly stem from Feuerbach. Religion has no real independent existence. It is a reflection of the material world and is derived from the social needs and hopes of human beings (see pp. 409–10). “The religious world is but the reflex of the real world.” Marx argues that “religion is just the imaginary sun which seems to humans to revolve around themselves until they realize that they themselves are the center of their own revolution.” In other words, God is simply a projection of human concerns. Human beings “look for a superhuman being in the fantasy reality of heaven, and find nothing there but their own reflection.”

Yet the human nature which generates religious ideas is “alienated.” The notion of alienation is of central importance to Marx’s account of the origins of religious belief. “Humans make religion; religion does not make humans. Religion is the self-consciousness and self-esteem of people who either have not found themselves or who have already lost themselves again.” Religion is the product of social and economic alienation. It arises from that alienation and at the same time encourages that alienation by a form of spiritual intoxication which renders the masses incapable of recognizing their situation and doing something about it. Religion is a comfort which enables people to tolerate their economic alienation. If there were no such alienation, there would be no need for religion. The division of labor and the existence of private property introduce alienation and estrangement into the economic and social orders.

Materialism affirms that events in the material world bring about corresponding changes in the intellectual world. Religion is thus the result of a certain set of social and economic conditions. Change those conditions, so that economic alienation is eliminated, and religion will cease to exist. It will no longer serve any useful function. Unjust social conditions produce religion and are in turn supported by religion. “The struggle against religion is therefore indirectly a struggle against the world of which religion is the spiritual fragrance.”

Marx thus argues that religion will continue to exist as long as it meets a need in the lives of alienated people. “The religious reflex of the real world can [...] only then vanish when the practical relations of everyday life offer to humanity none but perfectly intelligible and reasonable relations with regard to other human beings and to nature.” Feuerbach had argued that religion was the projection of human needs, an expression of the “uttered sorrow of the soul.”

Marx agreed with this interpretation. However, his point is more radical. It is not enough to explain how religion arises on account of sorrow and injustice. By changing that world, the causes of religion can be removed. It is important to note that Marx regards Feuerbach as correct in his analysis of the origins of religion, even if having failed to discern how an understanding of those origins might lead to its eventual elimination. It is this insight which underlies his often quoted 11th thesis on Feuerbach (1845): “The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it.”

Sigmund Freud (1856–1939): Religion as Wish Fulfillment

Earlier we explored Ludwig Feuerbach's radical idea that the concept of God is fundamentally a human construction, based on the “projection” of fundamental human longings and desires. Feuerbach's basic ideas were taken over, and given a new sense of direction, in the writings of the Austrian psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud. “All I have done – and this is the only thing that is new in my exposition – is to add some psychological foundation to the criticisms of my great predecessors.” In fact, it is probably fair to say that Feuerbach's “projection” or “wish-fulfillment” theory is best known today in its Freudian form, rather than in Feuerbach's original version. “Religion,” Freud wrote, “is an illusion and it derives its strength from the fact that it falls in with our instinctual desires.”

The most powerful statement of Freud's approach may be found in The Future of an Illusion (1927), which develops a strongly reductionist approach to religion. For Freud, religious ideas are “illusions, fulfillments of the oldest, strongest and most urgent wishes of mankind.” The parallels with Feuerbach are evident; yet Freud went on to develop a radical and original explanation of religion, grounded in the insights of the newly emerging discipline of psychoanalysis, which took Feuerbach's critique of religion to new heights. Illusions are not deliberate deceptions; they are simply ideas that arise from within the human unconsciousness, as it seeks to fulfill its deepest yearnings and longings. For Marx, those longings are the tragic outcome of social alienation, requiring social transformation for their elimination. For Freud, their origins lie not in society but in the human unconscious.

The first major statement of Freud's views on the origin of religion – which he increasingly came to refer to as “the psychogenesis of religion” – may be found in Totem and Taboo (1913). Developing his earlier observation that religious rites are similar to the obsessive actions of his neurotic patients, Freud declared that religion is basically a distorted form of an obsessional neurosis. The key elements in all religions, he argues, are the veneration of a father figure (such as God or Jesus Christ), faith in the power of spirits, and a concern for proper rituals.

Religion, according to Freud's historical account, arises through inner psychological pressures, which reflect the complex evolutionary history of humanity. In particular, Freud located the origins of belief in God in the human need for a father figure. In The Future of an Illusion, Freud argued that religion represents the perpetuation of a piece of infantile behavior in adult life. Religion is an immature response to the awareness of helplessness, involving regression to childhood experiences of paternal care: “my father will protect me; he is in control.” Belief in a personal God is thus little more than an infantile delusion. Religion is wishful thinking, an illusion. The psychological origins of human belief in God are thus to be found in a projection of the intense, unconscious desires of humanity. God is to be seen as a wish fulfillment, arising from repressed, unconscious infantile longings for protection and security. Therefore, religious beliefs owe their origins to a childlike feeling of helplessness, which arises in response to external dangers, internal impulses, and a fear of death. Just as children look to their parents to protect them from danger, so this infantile pattern is transferred to adulthood, in that adults create gods for themselves precisely because they had similar “gods” in their homes while they were growing up.

The cultural impact of Freud's approach has been immense, especially in North America. It is fair to say that, from about 1920, Freud's account of religion gained the ascendancy within the American intelligentsia, attracting a following exceeding even that of such postmodern writers as Paul de Man (1919–83) and Michel Foucault (1926–84) in more recent times. Freud set the cultural agenda of his day and for a generation beyond in a way that admirably justifies W. H. Auden's (1907–73) famous description of Freud as “not a person, but a whole climate of opinion.” Freud was regarded as having scientifically unlocked the hidden, repressed secrets of the human mind, thus enabling humanity to face its future with confidence and hope – and without religion. Although Freud's theories of the origins of religion are now generally regarded as unscientific speculation, their influence lingers on, and they are still occasionally encountered in some discussions of the nature and origins of religion.

Emile Durkheim (1858–1917): Religion and Ritual

In his Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1912), the French sociologist Emile Durkheim explored the relationship between religion and the institutions of society in general. The case study upon which most of his ideas are grounded is that of “totemism” in Australian aboriginal societies. For Durkheim, totemism represents the “elementary form of the religious life.” A totem was originally an animal or plant which was regarded as having especial symbolic significance for a people. It was thus treated as sacred – that is, as being set apart from the routine aspects of human life.

The reason for this, according to Durkheim, is that the totem comes to represent values which are central to society itself. As a result, it comes to be a symbol of the group. The reverence with which the totem is treated is, in reality, reverence for the group itself and its undergirding values. The true object of worship is thus not the totem but society itself. The ceremony and ritual which attend this worship are seen as reflections of the need for social cohesion. The special religious ceremonies which are associated with birth, marriage, and death are to be regarded as a reaffirmation of group solidarity at moments of cultural importance. Thus, funeral rites demonstrate that the values of a society will outlive the death of any of its individual members.

Despite the development of a scientific worldview, Durkheim believed that religion would continue to play an important role in the future, in view of its providing social cohesion for societies (a point we noted in relation to the sacraments, pp. 390–1). The emergence of “civil religion” in the United States, centering upon the person of the president and the symbol of the Stars and Stripes, could be seen as confirmation of this approach, as could the emergence of an atheist “state religion” in the former Soviet Union under Lenin and Stalin.

Mircea Eliade (1907–86): Religion and the Sacred

The Romanian-born scholar Mircea Eliade was noted for his pioneering work in the systematic study of religions. Although his interests enfolded a wide range of areas, he concentrated on the nature of religious culture, focusing especially on the role of myths and mystical experiences. Eliade's analysis of "rites of passage" (that is, rituals marking key transitional moments in the lifecycle, including birth and death) influenced many anthropologists. His often controversial books include scholarly works such as The Myth of the Eternal Return (1949) and The Sacred and the Profane (1959).

The concept of "the sacred" plays a major role in Eliade's thought. Eliade argues that "the sacred" is to be seen as the source of significance, meaning, power, and being. There are some obvious parallels between Eliade's concept and the idea propounded by the German theologian Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) that the experience of the holy is "numinous" or "wholly other."

While Eliade himself repeatedly identifies the sacred as something that is real, he nevertheless insists that "the sacred is a structure of human consciousness." According to Eliade, any phenomenal entity – for example, a tree – could be apprehended by its perceiver as a "hierophany" (revelation of the sacred), given appropriate preparation. To some, a tree discloses the sacred; to others, it remains nothing more than a tree. The framework which allows the tree to become a revelation of the sacred is determined by the experience of those for whom the tree is sacred. This suggests that, at least to some extent, the "sacred" is a social construction, determined by the history of the perceiver rather than a universal, objective notion.

One point of particular interest is Eliade's emphasis on the importance of "myth." Myths, he argues, are a particular kind of narrative, characterized by truth and reality, which exceed more scientific accounts of historical reality because of their ability to answer the deeper questions of life. "To tell how things came into existence is to explain them, and at the same time indirectly to answer another question: Why did they come into existence?" On account of its truth, a myth is able to become a hierophany – a revelation of the sacred. Myths narrate sacred history. For this reason, Eliade is skeptical of any attempt to eliminate myth from modern culture. It is a universal feature of human nature which religions continue to develop and embody. Instead of trying to rationalize or eliminate the sacred, Eliade argues, we ought to be trying to understand how it illuminates human nature, and its ultimate aspirations.

J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973) and C. S. Lewis (1898–1963): Religion as Myth

The Oxford lay theologians J. R. R. Tolkien and C. S. Lewis developed an approach to religions as myths – that is to say, as narratives which have the power to capture the imagination and convey information. Tolkien saw the human desire to tell stories about our origins and true destiny (which lie at the heart of any religion) as resulting from the divine creation of humanity: “we make in our measure and in our derivative mode, because we are made: and not only made, but made in the image and likeness of a Maker.” Tolkien saw Christianity as a “true myth,” which brought to fulfillment whatever truths were to be found in other religions.

C. S. Lewis was initially an atheist and moved slowly toward a generic belief in a god and then to a Christian faith. Tolkien was an important dialogue partner in this final stage of his conversion. Lewis came to the conclusion that Christianity was not primarily a set of doctrines or moral principles but a controlling grand narrative – a myth, in the true sense of the term – which generated and sustained such ideas and values. God chose to self-disclose under the form of “myth”; theology is a faithful intellectual response to this revelation.

For Lewis, God authorizes the use of myth as a means of captivating the human imagination and engaging the human reason. In The Pilgrim's Regress (1933), Lewis imagined God speaking these words: “this is the veil under which I have chosen to appear even from the first until now.” Christianity, rather than being one myth alongside many others, represents the fulfillment of all myths. It is the “true myth” toward which all other myths merely point. Christianity thus tells a true story about humanity which makes sense of all the stories that humanity tells about itself. The great pagan myths were thus “dim dreams or premonitions” of the greater and fuller truth of the Christian gospel:

The Divine light, we are told, “lighteneth every man.” We should, therefore, expect to find in the imagination of great Pagan teachers and myth-makers some glimpse of that theme which we believe to be the very plot of the whole cosmic story – the theme of incarnation, death, and rebirth.

Lewis's understanding of Christianity as the “true myth” had three important consequences:

1. It allowed paganism to be seen as an imperfect grasping toward the truth, which reaches its culmination in Christianity. Both Lewis and Tolkien make extensive use of Greek and especially Nordic mythology in their writings, seeing this as a “real though unfocused gleam of divine truth falling on the human imagination” (Tolkien).
2. Lewis held that Christian doctrines are subordinate to the greater reality that is articulated in the Christian “myth” or grand narrative. The narrative is primary; the doctrines are secondary – though real and important.
3. Lewis rejected the idea that Christian ideas or values could be detached from the myth that gives them their distinct identity and integrity. What the German New Testament scholar Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) provocatively termed “demythologization” was for Lewis a literary and theological impossibility. “We are invited to restate our belief in a form free from metaphor and symbol. The reason why we don't is that we can't.”

Karl Barth (1886–1968) and Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–45): Religion as a Human Invention

A final approach of considerable importance has its origins within Christianity, and specifically within the dialectical theology of Karl

Barth. This approach develops the idea that “religion” is a purely human construction, often an act of defiance in the face of God. Religion is here seen as an upward search for God on the part of humanity. This contrasts sharply with God's self-revelation, which exposes religion as a human fabrication.

Barth, it will be recalled (pp. 68, 72–3), received his theological education within German liberal Protestantism. The “culture Protestantism” of the period laid considerable emphasis upon the importance of human religiosity. In a lecture of 1916 entitled “The Righteousness of God,” Barth declared that human religiosity was little more than a Tower of Babel: a purely human construction, erected in defiance of God. There is a radical discontinuity between God's self-revelation to humanity, which leads to faith, and humanity's search for God, which leads to religion.

Barth is thus able to endorse criticisms of religion along the lines of Feuerbach and Marx, precisely because he believes these to be directed against the human invention of religion. Religion, for Barth, is an obstacle which must be eliminated if God is to be discerned in Christ. At its worst, it is idolatrous, in that it involves people worshipping a human construction.

Many writers have tried to summarize Barth's view on religion in the phrase “the abolition of religion.” It is certainly true that the standard English translation of section 17 of volume 1, part 2 of the Church Dogmatics is entitled “The Revelation of God as the Abolition of Religion.” This English phrase is, however, profoundly misleading and needs careful explanation. It must be remembered that Barth wrote in German, not English. The German word translated by “abolition” is Aufhebung, a term with a long and distinguished history of use within the German philosophical tradition, especially within Hegelianism. It is ambiguous and possesses two root meanings: “to remove” and “to exalt.”

It is certainly true that in his early writings Barth adopts a very negative attitude toward religion, understood as a human invention. Yet Barth is here stressing the natural human tendency to form concepts of God and to seek justification in relation to them. He is not criticizing other religions but religion in general. Barth sees the phenomenon of “religion” at work in Christianity as much as anywhere else; cultural values intrude into the gospel and become merged with it. Barth's intense anxiety about this development was particularly focused upon the German church struggle of the 1930s, in which he believed that Germanic ideals were becoming incorporated into Christian faith. However, Barth's attitude mellowed in his later period. He came increasingly to see the need for religion this side of eternity. For Barth, “religion” came more to mean “human institutions” or “modes of worship” than “a human attempt to determine what God is like.”

Barth insists that “religion” will continue until the end of time, as a necessary prop or support to faith. Barth's concern here is to emphasize that, by the grace of God, this “religion” is transcended and surpassed by God. It is something neutral, not negative. Barth's references to the Aufhebung of religion do not therefore make much sense if these are translated as referring to abolition. In fact, these comments should be interpreted in terms of the “transformation” or even “sublimation” of religion. Religion, seen as a human construction and contrasted with divine revelation, certainly needs to be critiqued – yet it serves a useful role.

This is most emphatically not what Dietrich Bonhoeffer thought. Bonhoeffer's most significant contribution to modern theology is generally regarded to be his analysis of the cultural situation within which Christ is to be proclaimed in the modern world. On April 5, 1943, Bonhoeffer was arrested by the Gestapo for his alleged involvement in a plot against Adolf Hitler. During the 18 months of his imprisonment at Berlin's Tegel prison, he wrote his celebrated Letters and Papers from Prison, in which he reflected on the question of the identity of Jesus Christ in a “world come of age,” a time of “no religion at all.” He argued passionately for a “religionless Christianity.”

This powerful phrase has often been misunderstood, particularly by writers such as John A. T. Robinson (1919–83) in his influential popular work Honest to God (1963). Bonhoeffer directed his criticisms against forms of Christianity which were grounded on the assumption that human beings were naturally religious – an assumption that Bonhoeffer regarded as untenable, given the new godless situation. A “religionless Christianity” is a faith which is based not upon the untenable and discredited notion of “natural human religiosity” but upon God's self-revelation in Christ. An appeal to culture, to metaphysics, or to religion was thus to be avoided, since these were inherently implausible in the new secular world and inevitably led to distorted understandings of God (there are strong affinities between Barth and Bonhoeffer here).

For Bonhoeffer, the crucified Christ provided us with a model of God appropriate for the modern world – a God who “allows himself to be pushed out of the world and on to the cross.” These ideas, especially as they related to the new secularism and the need to ground theology elsewhere than in religion or metaphysics, were to prove seminal to postwar German Christology, and had a deep impact upon many writers in the United States during the 1960s.

There were, however, obvious confusions here. Bonhoeffer's phrase “a religionless Christianity” and Barth's phrase “the abolition of religion” were taken by many more radical writers of the period to mean the end of any corporate Christian life, or an abandoning of traditional Christian ideas. These misunderstandings can be seen in influential popular works of the 1960s, such as John Robinson's Honest to God and the “death of God” movement.

Trinitarian Theologies of Religion

As noted earlier (pp. 323–6), the revival in trinitarianism has led to its explanatory and regulative fruitfulness being extended to include areas of Christian theology once regarded as lying beyond its reach, including the theology of other religions. The pioneering work in this field is often identified as Raimon Panikkar's (1918–2010) Trinity and the Religious Experience of Man (1973). Panikkar argued that a trinitarian framework offered a means of making sense of the complex nature of human spirituality, including religious experience and expression. These ideas were developed further in 1991 by Ninian Smart (1927–2001) and Stephen Konstantine. In their Christian Systematic Theology in World Context, Smart – a veteran commentator on world religions – and Konstantine argued that the concept of the “social Trinity” is the ultimate divine reality which constitutes the ground of all human religious experience. Differing forms of human spirituality are to be understood as arising from an experience of one of these three “aspects of the divine life” of the triune God.

In 1996, Jacques Dupuis (1923–2004) set out a different approach in his Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism. Dupuis, a Jesuit theologian with significant experience of the Indian context, argued that the doctrine of the Trinity “serves as the hermeneutical key for an interpretation of the experience of the Absolute Reality to which other religious traditions testify.” For Dupuis, this reflection opened up further the lines of thought already developed by his fellow Jesuit Karl Rahner (1904–84). “It may be said that the divine Trinity is experienced, though hiddenly and ‘anonymously’, wherever human beings allow the Divine Reality that impinges upon them to enter into their life. In every authentic religious experience the Triune God of Christian revelation is present and operative.” We shall explore Rahner’s notion of an “anonymous Christian” later in this chapter (pp. 419–20).

Gavin D’Costa’s (born 1958) The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity (2000) further confirmed the fruitfulness of a trinitarian approach to other religions. Though careful to emphasize that Christianity was the unique vehicle of divine salvation, D’Costa argued that the universal presence of the Holy Spirit had implications for other religions. For example, he suggested that the Christian church might be led more deeply into the life of God through an engagement with adherents of other religions, and that Christians may observe “Christ-likeness” in these adherents on account of the universal presence and work of the Spirit. A similar approach is found in the Pentecostal theologian Amos Yong (born 1965), especially in his Discerning the Spirit(s): A Pentecostal–Charismatic Contribution to Christian Theology of Religions (2000).

What is particularly significant about these trinitarian approaches to other religions is that they do not adopt a Barthian critique of “religion” but rather seek to understand both religions and their ideas within a trinitarian framework.

Having dealt with some approaches to the question of religion in general (including Christian approaches), we may now move on to examine some Christian approaches to other religions.

Christian Approaches to Other Religions

We now turn to consider Christian approaches to understanding the relationship between Christianity and other religious traditions. In what way can such traditions be understood, within the context of the Christian belief in the universal saving will of God, made known through Jesus Christ? It must be stressed that Christian theology is concerned with evaluating other religious traditions from the perspective of Christianity itself. Such reflection is not addressed to, or intended to gain approval from, members of other religious traditions or their secular observers.

Three broad approaches can be identified:

1. Exclusivism (also known as particularism), which holds that only those who hear and respond to the Christian gospel may be saved.
2. Inclusivism, which argues that, although Christianity represents the normative revelation of God, salvation is nonetheless possible for those who belong to other religious traditions. This class of approaches includes “parallelism,” a form of inclusivism which recognizes the obvious differences between the religions and argues that each religion is to be seen as valid, in that it achieves its own specific goals.

3. Pluralism, which holds that all the religious traditions of humanity are equally valid manifestations of, and paths to, the same core of religious reality.

We shall consider these three viewpoints individually. However, there are difficulties with this traditional threefold division of approaches into exclusivism, inclusivism, and pluralism. Readers must appreciate that these categories, though convenient for educational purposes, often prove inadequate to categorize the wide range of approaches now found within Christian theology. They are best seen as convenient ways of organizing approaches to other religions, rather than as distinct, coherent schools of thought.

For example, several theological approaches are very difficult to position using this threefold framework, largely because it fails to distinguish between the questions of truth and of salvation in other religions. A number of writers hold an “inclusivist” view regarding truth outside the Christian church yet at the same time hold an “exclusivist” view with regard to salvation. For example, Karl Barth straddles categories awkwardly, suggesting that they require revision if they are to be useful tools of description. Thinkers who may be assigned to a given category may nonetheless adopt quite different approaches to their topic. Furthermore, there is a sense in which each of the three positions – exclusivism, inclusivism, and pluralism – are “exclusivist” in their own right. Each assumes the other to be wrong and thus ends up making exclusivist claims of its own.

These concerns are well known, and alternatives certainly exist. For example, the Finnish scholar Veli-Matti Kärkkäinen has proposed the threefold scheme of “ecclesiocentrism,” “Christocentrism,” and “theocentrism.” However, none of the alternatives proposed has gained widespread support. For this reason, we shall retain the traditional scheme, despite its clear limitations.

Exclusivism

The viewpoint that is widely known as “exclusivism” can also be described as “particularism,” on account of its affirmation of the particular and distinctive features of the Christian faith. Perhaps the most influential statement of this position may be found in the writings of Hendrik Kraemer (1888–1965), especially his Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (1938). Kraemer emphasized that “God has revealed the Way and the Truth and the Life in Jesus Christ, and wills this to be known throughout the world.” This revelation is sui generis; it is in a category of its own and cannot be set alongside the ideas of revelation found in other religious traditions.

At this point, a certain breadth of opinion can be discerned within this approach. Kraemer himself seems to suggest that there is real knowledge of God outside Christ when he speaks of God shining through “in a broken, troubled way, in reason, in nature and in history.” The question is whether such knowledge is only available through Christ or whether Christ provides the only framework by which such knowledge may be discerned and interpreted elsewhere.

Some exclusivists (or, as some prefer to be styled, particularists), such as Karl Barth, adopt the position that there is no knowledge of God to be had apart from Christ; others (such as Kraemer) allow that God's self-revelation occurs in many ways and places but insist that this revelation can only be interpreted correctly, and known for what it really is, in the light of the definitive revelation of God in Christ. (There are important parallels here with the debate over natural and revealed knowledge of God.)

What, then, of those who have not heard the gospel of Christ? What happens to them? Are not particularists denying salvation to those who have not heard of Christ or who, having heard the Christian proclamation, choose to reject it? This criticism is frequently leveled against particularism by its critics. Thus, John Hick, arguing from a pluralist perspective, suggests that the doctrine that salvation is only possible through Christ is inconsistent with belief in the universal saving will of God. That this is not, in fact, the case is readily demonstrated by considering the view of Karl Barth, easily the most sophisticated of the twentieth-century defenders of this position.

Barth declares that salvation is only possible through Christ. He nevertheless insists on the ultimate eschatological victory of grace over unbelief – that is, at the end of history (a point we considered earlier, in connection with his doctrine of election, pp. 348–9).

Eventually, God's grace will triumph completely, and all will come to faith in Christ. This is the only way to salvation, but it is a way that, through the grace of God, is effective for all. For Barth, the particularity of God's revelation through Christ is not contradicted by the universality of salvation.

More recent expositions of the particularist position are associated with Stephen C. Neill (1900–84) and Lesslie Newbigin (1909–98), both British writers who spent a substantial part of their working lives as Christian bishops in India. Neill saw no tension between the affirmation of the unique status of Christianity and having respect for, and interest in, other religions. Yet he was clear that Christianity, by its very nature, calls the truth of other belief systems into question:

Christian faith claims for itself that it is the only form of faith for men; by its own claim to truth it casts the shadow of falsehood, or at least of imperfect truth, on every other system. This Christian claim is naturally offensive to the adherents of every other religious system. It is almost as offensive to modern man, brought up in the atmosphere of relativism, in which tolerance is regarded almost as the highest of the virtues. But we must not suppose that this claim to universal validity is something that can quietly be removed from the Gospel without changing it into something entirely different from what it is.

Neill concedes that, to non-Christians, this must sound like “crazy megalomania, and religious imperialism of the very worst kind.” Yet he believes that, while this aspect of the Christian faith is open to sensitive statement and application, it cannot be denied or diluted.

Lesslie Newbigin similarly affirms the uniqueness of the Christian faith, and the missionary obligation that arises from its distinctive view of reality. One of Newbigin's most important contributions to the exclusivist position lies in his defense of the particularity of the Christian faith. Newbigin strongly resists any attempt to suggest that Christianity is just one perspective on God, or one way of seeing a greater reality. The pluralist alternative to traditional ways of thinking, he argues, is flawed. Newbigin illustrates this by pointing out some of the difficulties associated with the pluralist approach of Wilfred Cantwell Smith (1916–2000), who asserts that all religions share a common core experience:

It is clear that in Smith's view "The Transcendent" is a purely formal category. He, she, or it may be conceived in any way that the worshiper may choose. There can therefore be no such thing as false or misdirected worship, since the reality to which it is directed is unknowable. Smith quotes as "one of the theologically most discerning remarks that I know" the words of the Yogavasishta: "Thou art formless. Thy only form is our knowledge of Thee." Any claim for uniqueness made for one concept of the Transcendent, for instance the Christian claim that the Transcendent is present in fullness in Jesus (Colossians 1: 19), is to be regarded as wholly unacceptable. There are no criteria by which different concepts of the Transcendent may be tested. We are shut up to a total subjectivity: the Transcendent is unknowable.

Newbigin therefore reaffirms what he regards as the classic Christian position: that Jesus Christ is the unique and distinctive ground and center of a unique and distinctive faith.

Inclusivism

The inclusivist approach holds that Christianity makes space for other religions. Rather than seeing them as degradations or denials of the truth, they are to be seen as important milestones along the road to the Christian faith. These ideas can be seen developing in British India during the second half of the nineteenth century, as increasing numbers of British theologians became familiar with Hinduism at first hand. The “fulfillment hypothesis,” especially associated with J. N. Farquhar (1861–1929), saw other faiths as pointing toward their fulfillment in Christianity.

The groundwork for the “fulfillment” model of the relationship of Christianity to other faiths was laid by the English theologian F. D. Maurice (1805–72), whose Religions of the World and their Relations to Christianity (1846) marked the beginning of the end of the missionary “defamation” of other religious traditions. Similar ideas were developed by B. F. Westcott (1825–1901), who spoke of “the progressive action of the Word” in the world's religions and of a “Divine plan in the education of the world.” These ideas began to be reflected in the Indian context. In a course of lectures given at Madras in 1876, the missionary writer and thinker T. E. Slater (1840–1912) set out the guiding principle of the “fulfillment” model as follows:

Not to present Christianity as an antagonistic Religion among other Religions of the world, not as a voice sounding the knell of doom to non-Christian nations, but, in the firm persuasion that all are by nature Christians, to hold it up as that in which Hindus would find realized and satisfied the noblest and earliest ideas of their sages, and the truest sentiments and yearnings of their hearts.

These ideas gained increasing popularity in the 1890s, resonating with a shift in both cultural and theological mood. In an editorial of 1908, the Madras Christian College Magazine, citing some words of Jesus of Nazareth from the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5: 17), set out the leading principle of what was increasingly becoming the new missionary orthodoxy: “‘I came not to destroy but fulfil’ is not a word to be limited in its application to Judaism. All that there is of truth and inspiration in other religions must find its fulfillment in Jesus Christ.”

The outbreak of the First World War brought such theological speculations to an end. Although such ideas were explored sporadically over the next decades, they never received the systematic exposition they required. The “fulfillment” approach to other religions was revived after the Second World War, particularly within Catholic theology. Jean Daniélou (1905–74) argued that Christianity was to be seen as the fulfillment of human longings for salvation and acceptance. Daniélou, a noted patristic scholar, developed arguments found in writers such as Justin Martyr (c.100–c.165), arguing that pagan religions are to be seen as “divine pedagogy.” The church “does not despise pagan teaching, but sets it free, fulfills it, and crowns it.” This has an important ecclesiological implication: that there are people who will be saved through Christ who are not members of the visible church:

The domain of Christ and of the Church extends beyond the limits of the explicit revelation of Christ and of the visible expansion of the Church. In every age and in every land there have been men who believed in Christ without knowing Him and who have belonged invisibly to the visible Church.

An influential variant of this approach was developed by the leading Jesuit writer Karl Rahner, who rapidly became known as the leading advocate of this “inclusive” approach. Rahner developed the approach far beyond its earlier modest statements.

In the fifth volume of his Theological Investigations, Rahner develops four theses, setting out the view not merely that individual non-Christians may be saved but also that the non-Christian religious traditions in general may have access to the saving grace of God in Christ. Karl Rahner's theology of religions is based on the core axioms of God's universal salvific will and the necessity of a specifically Christian faith:

1. Christianity is the absolute religion, founded on the unique event of the self-revelation of God in Christ. But this revelation took place at a specific point in history. Those who lived before this point, or who have yet to hear about this event, would thus seem to be excluded from salvation – which is contrary to the saving will of God.

2. For this reason, despite their errors and shortcomings, non-Christian religious traditions are valid and capable of mediating the saving grace of God, until the gospel is made known to their members. After the gospel has been proclaimed to the adherents of such non-Christian religious traditions, they are no longer legitimate, viewed from the standpoint of Christian theology.
3. The faithful adherent of a non-Christian religious tradition is thus to be regarded as an “anonymous Christian.”
4. Other religious traditions will not be displaced by Christianity. Religious pluralism will continue to be a feature of human existence.

We may explore the first three of these theses in a little more detail.

It will be clear that Rahner strongly affirms the principle that salvation may only be had through Christ, as he is interpreted by the Christian tradition. “Christianity understands itself as the absolute religion, intended for all people, which cannot recognize any other religion beside itself as of equal right.” Yet Rahner supplements this with an emphasis upon the universal saving will of God: God wishes that all shall be saved, even though not all know Christ. “Somehow all people must be able to be members of the church.”

For this reason, Rahner argues that saving grace must be available outside the bounds of the church – and hence in other religious traditions. He vigorously opposes those who adopt too-neat solutions, insisting that either a religious tradition comes from God or it is an inauthentic and purely human invention. Where Kraemer argued that non-Christian religious traditions were little more than self-justifying human constructions, Rahner argues that such traditions may well include elements of truth.

Rahner justifies this suggestion by considering the relationship between the Old and New Testaments. Although the Old Testament, strictly speaking, represents the outlook of a non-Christian religion (Judaism), Christians are able to read it and discern within it elements which continue to be valid. The Old Testament is evaluated in the light of the New, and, as a result, certain practices (such as dietary laws) are discarded as unacceptable while others (such as the moral law) are retained. The same approach can and should, Rahner argues, be adopted in the case of other religions.

The saving grace of God is thus available through non-Christian religious traditions, despite their shortcomings. Many of their adherents, Rahner argues, have thus accepted that grace, without being fully aware of what it is. It is for this reason that Rahner introduces the term “anonymous Christians” to refer to those who have experienced divine grace without necessarily knowing it.

This term has been heavily criticized. For example, John Hick has suggested that it is paternalist, offering “honorary status granted unilaterally to people who have not expressed any desire for it.” Nevertheless, Rahner's intention is to allow for the real effects of divine grace in the lives of those who belong to non-Christian traditions. Full access to truth about God (as it is understood within the Christian tradition) is not a necessary precondition for access to the saving grace of God.

Rahner does not allow that Christianity and other religious traditions may be treated as equal, or that they are particular instances of a common encounter with God. For Rahner, Christianity and Christ have an exclusive status, denied to other religious traditions. The question is: can other religious traditions give access to the same saving grace as that offered by Christianity? Rahner's approach allows him to suggest that the beliefs of non-Christian religious traditions are not necessarily true while allowing that they may, nevertheless, mediate the grace of God by the lifestyles which they evoke – such as a selfless love of one's neighbor. Rahner thus maintains that other religions are “lawful” while insisting that this lawfulness is temporary and provisional, valid only until an historical and existential encounter with Christianity.

A somewhat different approach is associated with the Second Vatican Council (1962–5). In its decree on other faiths (1965), the Council followed Rahner in affirming that rays of divine truth were indeed to be found in other religions. However, where Rahner allowed other faiths to have soteriological potential, the Council maintained the distinctiveness of the Christian faith at this point:

The Catholic Church rejects nothing of what is true and holy in these religions. She has a high regard for the manner of life and conduct, the precepts and doctrines which, although differing in many ways from her own teaching, nevertheless often reflect a ray of that truth which enlightens all men. Yet she proclaims and is in duty bound to proclaim without fail, Christ who is the way, the truth and the life (John 14: 6). In him, in whom God reconciled all things to himself (2 Corinthians 5: 18–19), men find the fullness of their religious life.

The distinction between Rahner and the Second Vatican Council can be summarized as follows.: Rahner is both revelationally and soteriologically inclusive; the Council tends to be revelationally inclusive yet soteriologically particularist.

The issue of religious pluralism is now being widely discussed within western evangelicalism. The general consensus within evangelicalism at present is strongly exclusivist. However, a minority opinion should be noted. The Canadian writer Clark H. Pinnock (1937–2010) draws on a Logos Christology similar to that of the apologists of the second century in building his argument for universal access to salvation, adopting an inclusivist position similar, in respects, to that of Karl Rahner.

The following considerations clearly influence his thinking:

If God really loves the whole world and desires everyone to be saved, it follows logically that everyone must have access to salvation. There would have to be an opportunity for all people to participate in the salvation of God. If Christ died for all, while yet sinners, the opportunity must be given for all to register a decision about what was done for them. They cannot lack the opportunity merely because someone failed to bring the Gospel of Christ to them. God's universal salvific will implies the equally universal accessibility of salvation for all people.

In recent years, growing discontent with the shortcomings of the pluralist approach has led to the emergence of a variant inclusivist approach, sometimes referred to as “parallelism.” Irritated at pluralist attempts to shoehorn all the religions into the same basic pattern (to be considered presently), writers such as Joseph DiNoia (born 1943) and Mark Heim have insisted that the distinctive features of each religion must be respected. In his The Diversity of Religions (1992), DiNoia pleads for religious diversity to be taken seriously and offers a critique of what he regards as the shortcomings of reductionist approaches. In his Salvations: Truth and Difference in Religion (1995), Heim critiques three major pluralistic thinkers: John Hick, Wilfred Cantwell Smith, and Paul Knitter (born 1939). He argues that all three create paradigms that arise from and are informed by the world of western liberal thought. The outcome is inevitable: they end up forcing religions into a preconceived mold.

For Heim, it is essential to respect religions for what they are. Instead of arguing that all religions ultimately lead to Christian truth (the inclusivist position) or to some ultimate reality which transcends all religious traditions (the pluralist position), Heim insists that we must take each religion's understanding of its beliefs and goals seriously. Christian beliefs and practices will lead to Christian goals – to the New Jerusalem. Muslims will attain a Muslim paradise on the basis of their beliefs and practices. Buddhist beliefs and practices will lead to Buddhist goals. And so on. Instead of forcing all religions to end up at the same place, Heim insists that we respect their own visions of what they are seeking to achieve.

Heim's position is itself a form of religious particularism. Writing from a Christian perspective, Heim insists that everyone must recognize both the actuality and the possible value of other religious particularisms, without trying to subsume them all into some grand, religiously neutral theory. Heim argues that pluralism is actually crypto-inclusivist, in that it claims to believe in many goals but actually believes in only one – namely, “reality-centeredness” in the case of John Hick, liberation from social oppression for Paul Knitter, and universal faith and rationality for Wilfred Cantwell Smith.

The parallelist way of thinking allows for the possibility that different religions may be deeply and genuinely different, offering their adherents competing goals which, however good each may be, are profoundly incompatible. That is why the title of Heim's book is so significant: Salvations – in the plural. Against the pluralist insistence that all religions ultimately lead to the same salvation, Heim argues that we must acknowledge and respect each religion's own distinctive understanding of what salvation actually is. “Christians can consistently recognize that some traditions encompass religious ends which are real states of human transformation, distinct from that Christians seek.” Christian theology should therefore consistently recognize that there are (or can be) many different religious goals, and hence many different salvations.

This position raises a number of questions. Its fundamental approach could be described as a “plurality of absolutes.” All religions are to be recognized as being completely right in their own terms. But how can this be? Can all be right? Heim's argument, in effect, is that these claims are justified, epistemically speaking, even if they may be mistaken. This conclusion reflects a postmodern reaction against the modernist insistence on a single standard of justification for beliefs. The religions develop their own standards of determining what justifies a belief, and their beliefs are justified by their own standards. It is an argument that is not without its problems. However, it certainly moves us away from the modernist assumptions that underlie pluralism. It remains to be seen how this new approach will be evaluated in the coming years.

Clark Pinnock and other inclusivists clearly believe that the difficulties encountered with the “particularist” or “exclusivist” model for understanding the relation of Christianity to other religions can be dealt with using the “inclusivist” approach. Others disagree: while recognizing the force of the difficulties of the “particularist” paradigm, they believe that these are more effectively addressed through a “pluralist” approach, to which we now turn.

Pluralism

The basic feature of the “pluralist” approach to the relationship of Christianity to other faiths is that each religion is understood to represent a distinctive, yet equally valid, grasp of some ultimate spiritual reality, which some religions term “God” and others define in rather more nontheistic or atheistic terms. For these reasons, pluralist writers tend to refer to the spiritual reality which they believe to lie behind all religions in terms such as “ultimate reality” or “the Real,” thus avoiding the explicit use of the term “God.”

The most significant exponent of a pluralist approach to religious traditions is John Hick. In writings such as God and the Universe of Faiths (1973) and The Second Christianity (1983), Hick argued for a need to move away from a Christ-centered to a God-centered approach. Describing this change as a “Copernican revolution,” Hick declared that it was necessary to move away from “the dogma that Christianity is at the centre to the realization that it is God who is at the centre, and that all religions [...] including our own, serve and revolve around him.” As Hick puts this point:

Now it seems to many of us today that we need a Copernican revolution in our understanding of the religions. The traditional dogma has been that Christianity is the centre of the universe of faiths, with all the other religions seen as revolving at various removes around the revelation in Christ and being graded according to their nearness to or distance from it. But during the last hundred years or so we have been making new observations and have realized that there is deep devotion to God, true sainthood, and deep spiritual life within these other religions; and so we have created our epicycles of theory, such as the notions of anonymous Christianity and of implicit faith. But would it not be more realistic now to make the shift from Christianity at the centre to God at the centre, and to see both our own and the other great world religions as revolving around the same divine reality?

Developing this approach, Hick suggests that the aspect of God's nature of central importance to the question of other faiths is his universal saving will. If God wishes everyone to be saved, it is inconceivable that the divine self-revelation should be effected in such a way that only a small portion of humanity could be saved. In fact, as we have seen, this is not a necessary feature of either particularist or inclusivist approaches. However, Hick draws the conclusion that it is necessary to recognize that all religions lead to the same God. Christians have no special access to God, who is universally available through all religious traditions.

Hick uses an essentially Kantian philosophical framework to argue that a distinction must be made between the ultimate spiritual reality which underlies the various religious systems of the world and the perceptions of this reality which exist within these systems. Kant (1724–1804) had insisted that the “thing in itself” could not be known directly; humanity was obliged to limit its reflections to the world of phenomena, which at best offered an indirect knowledge of that reality. “The Real” was thus inaccessible; the religions offered human responses to that “Real” which reflected the historical and social context in which the religions of the world evolved:

This distinction enables us to acknowledge both the one unlimited transcendent divine Reality and also a plurality of varying human concepts, images, and experiences of and response to that Reality. These different human awarenesses of and responses to the Real are formed by and reciprocally inform the religious traditions of the earth. In them are reflected the different ways of thinking, feeling and experiencing which have developed within the worldwide human family.

This suggestion is not without its problems. For example, it is fairly clear that the religious traditions of the world are radically different in their beliefs and practices. Hick deals with this point by suggesting that such differences must be interpreted in terms of “both/and” rather than “either/or.” They should be understood as complementary, rather than contradictory, insights into the one divine reality. This reality lies at the heart of all the religions; yet “their differing experiences of that reality, interacting over the centuries with the different thought-forms of different cultures, have led to increasing differentiation and contrasting elaboration.” Hick states this point as follows in his Second Christianity:

Thus the concept of deity is concretized as a range of divine personae – Yahweh, the Heavenly Father, Allah, Krishna, Shiva, etc. Each of these personae has arisen within human experience through the impact of the divine Reality upon some particular stream of human life. Thus Yahweh is the face of God turned towards and perceived by the Jewish people or, in more philosophical language, the concrete form in which the Jews have experienced the infinite divine Reality. As such, Yahweh exists essentially in relation to the Hebrews, the relationship being defined by the idea of covenant. He cannot be extracted from his role in Hebrew historic experience. He is part of the history of the Jews, and they are a part of his history. And as such Yahweh is a quite different divine persona from Krishna, who is God's face turned towards and perceived by hundreds of millions of people within the Vaishnavite tradition of India.

It will be clear that this idea is very similar to that propounded by Deist writers of the “universal rational religion of nature” which became corrupted through time.

These difficulties relate to observed features of religious traditions. In other words, the beliefs of non-Christian religions make it difficult to accept that they are all speaking of the same God. But a more fundamental theological worry remains: is Hick actually talking about the Christian God at all? A central Christian conviction – that God is revealed definitively in Jesus Christ – has to be set to one side to allow Hick to proceed. Hick argues that he is merely adopting a “theocentric,” rather than a “Christocentric,” approach. Yet the Christian insistence that God is known normatively through Christ implies that authentically Christian knowledge of God is derived through Christ. For a number of critics, Hick's desertion of Christ as a reference point means abandoning any claim to speak from a Christian perspective.

The real problem here is that pluralists such as Hick are caught up in a tension that they cannot resolve: there is an implicit need to provide arguments for the superiority of their own pluralist views about human nature and human destiny over and against traditional religious views, on the one hand, yet this is coupled with an explicit commitment to principles that exclude the legitimacy of precisely these arguments, on the other.

Pluralists want to critique and challenge Christian tendencies to be (as they see it) imperialist and condescending in their judgments about non-Christian religions. Yet, in doing this, pluralists are themselves engaging in precisely the activity they wish to criticize – namely, critiquing Christians for holding Christian views. Yet why should Christians be blamed for holding Christian ideas? Or Muslims for holding Islamic ideas? No system of thought can sustain such a tension.

More significantly, questions have been raised over the intellectual basis of this model. Drawing on the insights of philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre (born 1929), Gavin D'Costa has pointed out that there is no such thing as a “detached” or “objective” view of religion. All such reflections arise from within traditions, despite the Enlightenment's belief that objectivity can be attained in this matter. D'Costa thus argues that Hick's approach to religious pluralism actually “represents a tradition-specific approach that bears all the same features as exclusivism – except that it is western liberal modernity's exclusivism.” The intellectual foundations of Hick's pluralism are incorrigibly modern.

For this reason, there has been growing interest in recent years in an alternative which might be able to avoid the intellectual shortcomings of the pluralist position. The new approach known as “parallelism,” discussed earlier in this chapter (pp. 421–2), in effect offers a postmodern approach to this issue, avoiding the weaknesses of the resolute modernism of Hick's pluralist approach.

The debate over the Christian understanding of the relationship of Christianity to other religious traditions will continue for some considerable time, fueled by the rise of multiculturalism in western society. The three options outlined above are likely to continue to be represented in Christian writing on the matter for some time to come.

Our attention now turns to the final aspect of Christian theology, traditionally known as “the last things” or, more technically, as “eschatology.”

Questions for Chapter 17

1. How would you define a “religion”?
2. Why was Dietrich Bonhoeffer so attracted to the idea of a “religionless Christianity”?
3. Do all religions lead to God?
4. Why has there been such interest recently in the idea that Christianity represents the fulfillment of the religious aspirations of humanity?
5. How helpful and persuasive do you find Karl Rahner's idea of an “anonymous Christian”?
6. Why have ideas such as the resurrection and divinity of Christ proved to be such a hindrance to interfaith dialogue? Is there a case for their elimination, in order to make such a dialogue more fruitful?

In earlier discussions of the resurrection and the doctrine of salvation, we touched upon aspects of eschatology – that is, the Christian understanding of the “last things.” The term “eschatology,” which came into general use in the twentieth century, derives from the Greek term ta eschata, “the last things,” and relates to theological topics such as the Christian expectations of resurrection and judgment. Several aspects of this topic, such as the eschatological dimensions of the Christian doctrine of salvation, have already been touched on elsewhere in this volume (pp. 250–1). In the concluding chapter of this work, we shall deal with this subject in more detail.

In the broadest sense of the term, “eschatology” is “discourse about the end.” The “end” in question may refer to an individual's existence or to the closing of the present age. A characteristic Christian belief, of major importance in this context, is that time is linear, not cyclical. History had a beginning; it will one day come to an end. “Eschatology” deals with a network of beliefs relating to the end of life and history, whether of an individual or of the world in general. It has unquestionably stimulated and contributed extensively to some of the most creative and fantastic movements within Christianity.

In recent years, a distinction has been drawn between the two terms “eschatological” and “apocalyptic.” In the past, these terms had been regarded as meaning more or less the same thing. Since about 1980 there has been an increased awareness of the different meanings of the two terms. “Eschatology” continues to designate the branch of Christian theology concerned with the “last things,” such as resurrection from the dead, heaven, and hell. The term “apocalyptic” is now used to refer to a particular genre or type of literature which generally has an interest in the “last things” but is not specifically identified by this interest. To make this difficult point clearer, we may explore the matter in more detail.

The term “apocalyptic” (deriving from the Greek word apocalypsis, meaning “unveiling,” “disclosure,” or “revelation”) is now used to refer to a particular type of writing found within sections of Judaism during the period extending from about two hundred years before Christ to about two hundred years after his coming. During this period, sections of Judaism produced writings which reflected a distinctive worldview and style of writing. Apocalyptic writings generally focus on the expectation of God's imminent intervention in the affairs of the world, in which God's people will be delivered and their enemies destroyed, with the present world order being overthrown and replaced with a restored creation.

Particular emphasis is often placed on the role of visions and dreams, through which the writers learned of the secret plans of God. It will therefore be clear that, while apocalyptic writings have an interest in the “last things,” the term “apocalyptic” is better used to refer to a type of theology and a style of writing.

Developments in the Doctrine of the Last Things

In what follows, we shall briefly consider the New Testament foundations of eschatology before moving on to consider their more recent interpretations in academic theology. Popular theology, whether medieval or contemporary, has always been less restrained and more picturesque in its reflections on the last things, and it is worth studying it its own right. Sadly, this lies beyond the scope of this work.

The New Testament

The New Testament is saturated with the belief that something new has happened in the history of humanity in and through the life and death of Jesus Christ, and above all through his resurrection from the dead. The theme of hope predominates, even in the face of death. In view of the importance of the New Testament material to the shaping of Christian thinking on eschatology, we shall consider some of its leading themes. The two sources of outstanding importance are generally agreed to be the preaching of Jesus himself and the writings of Paul. We shall consider each of these in what follows.

The dominant theme in the preaching of Jesus is the coming of the kingdom of God. This phrase is rare in contemporary Jewish writings, and is widely regarded as one of the most distinctive aspects of the preaching of Jesus. This term, or closely related ideas, occurs some 70 times in the synoptic gospels. The use of the word “kingdom” in this context is potentially misleading. Although this English word has been used regularly since the sixteenth century to translate the Greek term basileia, the term “kingship” is more appropriate. The term “kingdom” suggests a definite geographical region which is being ruled, whereas the Greek term refers primarily to the act of ruling itself. In New Testament scholarship, the term “the kingly rule of God” has often been used to make this point clear.

The term has strongly eschatological associations in the preaching of Jesus. Although many nineteenth-century liberal writers, such as Albrecht Benjamin Ritschl (1822–89), attempted to interpret it in terms of a present set of moral values, it is clear that the term has both present and future associations. The kingdom is something which is “drawing near” (Mark 1: 15) yet which still belongs in its fullness to the future. The Lord's Prayer, which remains of central importance to individual and corporate Christian prayer and worship, includes reference to the future coming of the kingdom (Matthew 6: 10).

At the Last Supper, Jesus of Nazareth spoke to his disciples of a future occasion when they would drink wine in the kingdom of God (Mark 14: 25). The general consensus among New Testament scholars is that there is a tension between the “now” and the “not yet” in relation to the kingdom of God, similar to that envisaged by the parable of the growing mustard seed (Mark 4: 30–2). The term “inaugurated eschatology” has become widely used to refer to the relationship between the present inauguration and future fulfillment of the kingdom.

Paul's eschatology also shows a tension between the "now" and the "not yet." This is articulated in terms of a number of key images, which may be summarized as follows:

1. At several points, Paul emphasizes that the coming of Christ inaugurated a new era or "age" (Greek: aionos). Although this new age – which Paul designates a "new creation" (2 Corinthians 5: 17) – has yet to be fulfilled, its presence can already be experienced. For this reason, Paul can refer to the "end of the ages" in Christ (1 Corinthians 10: 11). The position which Paul opposes in the early chapters of 1 Corinthians clearly corresponds to a realized eschatology, in which each and every aspect of the age to come has been fulfilled in the present. It seems that Paul's opponents at Corinth were teaching that the final age was now present and that all the benefits of eternity were to be had in the here and now. For Paul, there is an element of postponement: the ultimate transformation of the world is yet to come but may be confidently awaited.
2. The resurrection of Jesus is seen by Paul as an eschatological event which affirms that the "new age" really has been inaugurated. Although this does not exhaust the meaning of Christ's resurrection (which has significant soteriological implications; see pp. 255–8), Paul clearly sees Christ's resurrection as an event which enables believers to live in the knowledge that death – a dominant feature of the "present age" – has been overcome.
3. Paul looks forward to the future coming of Jesus Christ in judgment at the end of time, confirming the new life of believers and their triumph over sin and death. A number of images are used to refer to this, including "the day of the Lord." At one point (1 Corinthians 16: 22) Paul uses an Aramaic term, maranatha (literally, "come, O Lord!") as an expression of the Christian hope.

The Greek term parousia is often used to refer to the future coming of Christ (e.g., 1 Corinthians 15: 23; 2 Thessalonians 2: 1, 8–9). For Paul, there is an intimate connection between the final coming of Christ and the execution of final judgment.

4. A major theme of Paul's eschatology is the coming of the Holy Spirit. This theme, which builds on a long-standing aspect of Jewish expectations, sees the gift of the Spirit as a confirmation that the new age has dawned in Christ. One of the most significant aspects of Paul's thought at this point is his interpretation of the gift of the Spirit to believers as an arrabon (2 Corinthians 1: 22, 5: 5). This word, rarely used in the New Testament, has the basic sense of a “guarantee” or “pledge,” affirming that the believer may rest assured of ultimate salvation on account of the present possession of the Spirit. Although salvation remains something which will be consummated in the future, the believer may have present assurance of this future event through the indwelling of the Spirit. It will therefore be clear that the eschatology of the New Testament is complex. However, a leading theme is that something which happened in the past has inaugurated something new, which will reach its final consummation in the future. The Christian believer is thus caught up in the tension between the “now” and the “not yet.” How this tension is to be understood and articulated is a subject of considerable interest in its own right and will be considered at points in this present chapter. Our attention now turns to the development of eschatological themes in the later Christian tradition.

Early Christianity and Roman Beliefs About Reunion after Death

The human longing for consolation in the face of death may be traced back to classical times. Perhaps the most distressing aspect of death is that of separation – being forcibly, and it might seem irreversibly, cut off from close friends and relatives, never to see them again.

Classical mourning rites and funeral ornaments point to the sense of desolation that traditionally accompanied the death of a significant other. The Hellenistic world had become accustomed to the Hades myth, which portrayed Charon as ferrying the dead across the river Styx to the underworld for the fee of one obolos – a silver coin worth a sixth of a drachma – which was placed in the mouth of a dead person for this purpose. Once on the other side, the dead person took part in a family reunion.

This basic belief undergirds two important works of the Roman philosopher Cicero (106–43 bc), the dialogue On Old Age and, perhaps more importantly, the final section of On the Republic known as “Scipio's Dream.” In this latter work, Cicero portrays Scipio meeting prominent Roman citizens in paradise, who take advantage of the occasion to lecture him on political ethics. Yet the work takes on a new tone as Cicero describes Scipio's reunion with his father: “I now saw my dead father, Paulus, approaching, and I burst into tears. My father put his arms around me and kissed me, urging me not to weep.”

This classic scenario of a family reunion in the world to come had a significant impact on the style and subject matter of the Christian writings of the era, even if they ultimately rested on rather different theological foundations. Cyprian of Carthage (died 258), a martyr bishop of the third century, tried to encourage his fellow Christians in the face of suffering and death at times of persecution by holding before them a vision of heaven, in which they would see the martyrs and apostles, face to face. More than that – they would be reunited with those whom they loved and cherished. Heaven is here seen as the “native land” of Christians, from which they have been exiled during their time on earth. The hope of return to their native land, there to be reunited with those whom they knew and loved, was held out as a powerful consolation in times of trial and suffering.

We regard paradise as our native land [Patriam nostram paradisum computamus]. [...] Many of our dear ones await us there, and a dense crowd of parents, brothers, children, is longing for us, already assured of their own safety, and still longing for our salvation. What gladness there will be for them and for us when we enter their presence and share their embrace!

Cyprian himself was martyred for his faith in 258, presumably consoled by precisely the ideas with which he sought to console others.

The motif is also found in the funeral eulogy of Ambrose of Milan (c.337–97) for the emperor Theodosius, who died in Milan in January 395. Theodosius had earlier had a serious altercation with Ambrose as a result of his decision in 390 to order the slaughter of 7,000 citizens of Thessalonica to avenge the murder of the Roman governor Butheric. Ambrose, having consulted with his fellow bishops, informed Theodosius that he must do severe public penance before being allowed again to receive the sacraments. Theodosius eventually stripped himself of every sign of royalty and publicly repented of his sin. In his funeral oration, Ambrose asked his listeners to imagine the scene in heaven in which Theodosius embraces his wife Flaccila and his daughter Pulcheria, before being reunited with both his father and Constantine (272–337; reigned 306–37), his predecessor as a Christian Roman emperor.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430): The Two Cities

One of the most influential reworkings of the corporate dimension of the eschatological ideas of the New Testament is that of Augustine of Hippo, found in his City of God. This work was written in a context which could easily be described as “apocalyptic” – the destruction of the great city of Rome and the collapse of the Roman empire. A central theme of the work is the relationship between two cities – the “city of God” and the “secular city” or “city of the world.” The complexities of the Christian life, especially its political aspects, stem from the dialectic between these two cities.

Believers live “in this intermediate period” separating the incarnation of Christ from his final return in glory. The church is to be seen as in exile in the “city of the world.” It is in the world, yet not of the world. There is a strong eschatological tension between the present reality, in which the church is exiled in the world and somehow obliged to maintain its distinctive ethos while surrounded by disbelief, and the future hope, in which the church will be delivered from the world and finally allowed to share in the glory of God. It will be clear that Augustine has no time for the Donatist idea of the church as a body of saints (pp. 358–60). For Augustine, the church shares in the fallen character of the world and therefore includes the pure and the impure, saints and sinners. Only at the last day will this tension finally be resolved.

Yet, alongside this corporate understanding of eschatology, Augustine shows an awareness of the individualist dimensions of the Christian hope. This is especially clear in his discussion of the tension between what human nature presently is and what it finally will be. Believers are saved, purified, and perfected – yet in hope (in spe) but not in reality (in re). Salvation is something that is inaugurated in the life of the believer but which will only find its completion at the end of history. This idea was also developed by Martin Luther (1483–1546), as noted earlier (pp. 338–9).

Augustine is thus able to offer Christians hope, as they contemplate the sinful nature of their lives and wonder how this is to be reconciled with the gospel imperatives to be holy, like God. For Augustine, believers are able to reach out in hope, beyond their present condition. This is not a spurious or invented hope but a sure and certain hope which is grounded in the resurrection of Christ.

Augustine is aware of the fact that the word “end” has two meanings. The “end” can mean “either the ceasing to be of what was, or the perfecting of what was begun.” Eternal life is to be seen as the state in which our love of God, begun in this life, is finally brought to its completion and consummation, through union with the object of that love. Eternal life is the “reward that makes perfect,” to which the Christian has looked forward throughout the life of faith.

Joachim of Fiore (c.1132–1202): The Three Ages

Augustine had proposed a relatively simple schematization of Christian history, which treated the period of the church as that era separating the coming (or “advent”) and returning (or “Second Coming”) of Christ. However, this failed to satisfy his later interpreters. Joachim of Fiore developed a more speculative approach to history with a strongly eschatological orientation loosely based upon the doctrine of the Trinity. Joachim became a monk in the Benedictine monastery of Corazzo and was elected its abbot in 1177. He did not find this position to his liking and was eventually given permission to found his own congregations in the Sila mountains.

According to Joachim, universal history can be divided into three ages or eras:

1. The age of the Father, which corresponds to the Old Testament dispensation. Joachim referred to this as the ordo conjugatorum, in which humanity lived under the Law until the end of the period of the Old Testament.
2. The age of the Son, which corresponds to the New Testament dispensation, including the church. Joachim designated this period as the ordo clericorum.
3. The age of the Spirit, which would witness the rise of new religious movements, leading to the reform and renewal of the church and the final establishment of peace and unity on earth. Joachim referred to this period as the ordo monachorum.

What gave Joachim's views a particular urgency was the precise dating of these periods. Each age, he argued, consisted of 42 generations of 30 years each. As a result, the “age of the Son” was due to end in 1260, to be followed immediately by the radical new “age of the Spirit.” In this may be seen anticipated many of the millenarian movements of our own day.

Joachim's ideas caused consternation at the time, especially as the year 1260 approached, and ecclesiastical anxiety grew about the popular impact of his ideas. His views were condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 and described as “conjectural” by Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74). In 1255 – only five years before Joachim's new era of the Spirit was due to dawn – his prophecies were censured as completely erroneous by a papal theological commission. Yet others were more favorably disposed toward Joachim. Dislike of the highly institutional nature of the church led many to welcome Joachim's vision of a new “age of the Spirit,” and the advent of the “spiritual church” in its place.

Dante Alighieri (1265–1321): The Divine Comedy

Among those who had a high regard for Joachim we may note the Tuscan poet Dante Alighieri, who assigned him a place in paradise. Dante, based in the city of Florence, wrote the Divine Comedy in order to give poetic expression to the Christian hope and make comments on the life of both the church and city of Florence of his own day. The poem is set in the year 1300 and describes how Dante is led into the depths of the earth by the pagan Roman poet Virgil, who will act as his guide through hell and purgatory.

The work is an important representation of the medieval worldview, in which the souls of the departed were understood to pass through a series of purifying and cleansing processes before being enabled to catch a glimpse of the vision of God – the ultimate goal of the Christian life. Its importance for our purposes in this section is its vivid depiction of the spiritual geography of the last things.

The Divine Comedy takes the form of three major interconnected poems, respectively entitled Inferno (“Hell”), Purgatorio (“Purgatory”), and Paradiso (“Paradise”). The work makes substantial use of the leading themes of Christian theology and spirituality while at the same time including comment on contemporary political and social events.

The poem describes a journey which takes place in Holy Week 1300 – before Dante's exile from Florence. From the substantial number of clues in the text, it can be worked out that the journey begins at nightfall on Good Friday. After entering Hell, Dante journeys downwards for an entire day, before beginning his ascent toward Purgatory. After climbing Mount Purgatory, Dante rises further until he eventually enters into the presence of God.

Throughout the journey, Dante is accompanied by guides. The first guide is Virgil, the great Roman poet who wrote the Aeneid. It is widely thought that Dante uses Virgil as a symbol of classical learning and human reason. As they draw close to the peak of Mount Purgatory, Virgil falls behind and Dante finds himself in the company of Beatrice (thought to be based on Beatrice Portinari, the idealized object of Dante's courtly love, who had died in 1290), who leads him through the outer circles of heaven. Finally, he is joined by the great medieval writer and sage Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), who leads Dante into the presence of God.

The structure of the poem is immensely intricate, and it can be read on a number of levels. It can, for example, be read as a commentary on medieval Italian politics, particularly the intricacies of Florentine politics over the period 1300–4, or it can be seen as a poetic guide to Christian beliefs concerning the afterlife. More fundamentally, it can be read as a journey of self-discovery and spiritual enlightenment, in which the poet finally discovers and encounters his heart's desire.

Dante's portrayal of the geography of hell is especially interesting, as he conceives of hell as consisting of a group of concentric circles – the perfect shape, according to ancient geometry. The “nine circles of hell” are as follows:

Level Name
1	Limbo
2	The Lustful
3	The Gluttonous
4	The Avaricious
5	The Wrathful
6	Heretics
7	The Violent
8	The Fraudulent
9	The Treacherous

Dante portrays himself as descending through successive levels of hell, encountering various individuals who are condemned to its different regions. One of the most interesting aspects of Dante scholarship is to work out why Dante consigns various people to different fates – often reflecting aspects of papal and Florentine politics of the period. For example, “limbo” is seen as a kind of “ante-hell,” in which no pain is experienced and which is illuminated by a “hemisphere of light” corresponding to the light of human reason. Dante populates this region with virtuous non-Christians, particularly pagan philosophers such as Aristotle (who is clearly the philosopher for Dante), Seneca, Euclid, and Virgil. Beyond this lies the second circle of hell, to which Dante consigns all those who have “made reason slave to appetite.” Dante includes Achilles, Cleopatra, Helen of Troy, and Tristan (a hero of many medieval romances) among the inhabitants of this region.

Dante's Divine Comedy helped to establish medieval perceptions of hell to no small extent. It is perhaps worth noting that Dante's vision represents a very substantial (and rather speculative!) elaboration on the very little biblical material which we possess on this matter. Dante knew that eschatological speculation made for excellent reading, and enlivened his text with comments on the city and church politics of his time. The work deserves close reading, both as a work of literature and as a witness to the medieval vision of the world.

The Enlightenment: Eschatology as Superstition

The intensely rationalist atmosphere of the Enlightenment (pp. 58–61) led to criticism of the Christian doctrine of the last things as ignorant superstition, devoid of any real basis in life. Particular criticism was directed against the idea of hell. The strongly utilitarian outlook of the later Enlightenment resulted in a growing belief that eternal punishment served no useful purpose. Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72) argued that the idea of “heaven” or “eternal life” was simply a projection of a human longing after immortality, without any objective basis.

A more sustained critique of the Christian doctrine of hope was found in the writings of Karl Marx (1818–83; pp. 410–11). Marx argued that religion in general sought to comfort those undergoing suffering in the present by persuading them of the joy of an afterlife. By doing so, it distracted them from the task of transforming the present world so that suffering could be eliminated. In many ways, Marxism may be regarded as a secularized Christian eschatology, with “the revolution” as a secularized counterpart to “heaven.”

Related developments can be discerned within nineteenth-century liberalism (pp. 70–1). The idea of a cataclysmic end of history was set to one side in favor of a doctrine of hope which was grounded in the gradual evolution of humanity toward moral and societal perfection. The Darwinian theory of natural selection, as expressed in popular versions of the theory of evolution, seemed to point to human history, like all of human life, moving upward toward higher and more sophisticated forms. Eschatology came to be relegated to the status of a theological curiosity. The notion of the “kingdom of God,” shorn of its New Testament apocalyptic associations, was viewed (e.g., by Albrecht Ritschl) as a static realm of moral values, toward which society was steadily advancing through a process of continuous evolution.

The Twentieth Century: The Rediscovery of Eschatology

The Enlightenment approach was largely discredited by two developments. In the first place, in the closing decade of the nineteenth century Johannes Weiss (1863–1914) and Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965) rediscovered the apocalyptic character of the preaching of Jesus and argued forcefully that the “kingdom of God” was an eschatological notion (pp. 238–9). Jesus was to be seen not as the moral educator of humanity but as the proclaimer of the imminent coming of the eschatological kingdom of God. This new emphasis proved to be of decisive importance in bringing about the recovery of eschatology in the twentieth century.

It must be stressed that not all New Testament scholars have agreed with the findings of Weiss and Schweitzer. For example, the British New Testament scholar Charles H. Dodd (1884–1973) argued that Jesus's preaching of the kingdom of God was not futurist, looking forward to something which had yet to happen, but “realized” – that is, it had already happened. In his Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (1936), Dodd argued that the “last things” have actually happened in the ministry of Jesus. What the Old Testament prophets regarded as future (such as the coming of the “Day of the Lord”) has been fulfilled or realized in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Dodd pointed out how Jesus himself declared that the “kingdom of God is at hand.” The kingdom of God is not something in the distant future; it has already come upon people (Matthew 12: 28). The future does not lie ahead, in the distance – it has already happened, in the coming of Jesus.

Critics of this approach argued that Dodd had overstated his case. For example, it was suggested that the Greek original of the statement “the kingdom of God is at hand” more probably means “the kingdom of God is nearer now than it was earlier.” In other words, the kingdom has not yet arrived, but it is closer than it was before. In some of his later writings, Dodd appears to have responded to this criticism. He began to write about the kingdom having “begun” rather than “arrived,” and of “initiation” rather than of “realization.” In other words, Dodd conceded that the “last things” in all their totality had yet to happen, even if they had begun to take place.

Three general positions are widely encountered within twentieth-century Christian discussion of the eschatology of the New Testament, as follows. It should be noted that it is the second of the three positions, here described as “inaugurated,” which commands the greatest support within New Testament scholarship.

1. Futurist. The kingdom of God is something which remains in the future and will intervene disruptively in the midst of human history (Weiss).
2. Inaugurated. The kingdom of God has begun to exercise its influence within human history, although its full realization and fulfillment lie in the future.
3. Realized. The kingdom of God has already been realized in the coming of Jesus (Dodd).

The second development which we need to consider concerns a general collapse in confidence in human civilization as a means of bringing the kingdom of God to fulfillment. The First World War was an especially traumatic episode in this respect. The Holocaust, the development of nuclear weapons and the threat of nuclear war, and the continuing threat of the destruction of the environment through human exploitation of its resources have all raised doubts concerning the credibility of the vision of liberal humanist forms of Christianity.

But what was to be done with the idea of eschatology? One approach, which attracted considerable attention during the 1950s and early 1960s, stemmed from the Marburg New Testament scholar Rudolf Bultmann. We will consider this in what follows.

Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976): The Demythologization of Eschatology

Bultmann's controversial program of "demythologization" (pp. 114, 258) proved to be especially significant in relation to beliefs concerning the end of history. Bultmann argued that such beliefs were "myths," which required to be interpreted existentially. The New Testament relates "stories" concerning remote and inaccessible times and places (such as "in the beginning" or "in heaven"), and involving supernatural agents or events. Bultmann declared that these stories possess an underlying existential meaning, which can be perceived and appropriated by a suitable process of interpretation.

Perhaps the most important of these is the eschatological myth of the imminent end of the world through direct divine intervention, leading to judgment and subsequent reward or retribution. This insight is of central importance to our narrative since it allows Bultmann to deal with Schweitzer's demonstration of the "thoroughgoing eschatological conditioning" of the New Testament by a comprehensive process of demythologization. For Bultmann, this "myth," and others like it, may be reinterpreted existentially.

Thus, in the case of the eschatological myth, the recognition that history has not, in fact, come to an end does not necessarily invalidate the myth: interpreted existentially, the "myth" refers to the here and now of human existence – the fact that human beings must face the reality of their own death and are thus forced to make existential decisions. The "judgment" in question is not some future event of divine judgment, to take place at the end of the world, but the present event of our own judgment of ourselves, based upon our knowledge of what God has done in Christ.

Bultmann argues that precisely this sort of demythologizing may be found in the fourth gospel, written toward the end of the first century, when the early eschatological expectations of the Christian community were fading. "Judgment" is interpreted by Bultmann to refer to the moment of existential crisis, as human beings are confronted with the divine kerygma addressed to them. The "realized eschatology" of the fourth gospel arises through the fact that the redactor of the gospel has realized that the parousia is not some future event but one which has already taken place, in the confrontation of the believer with the kerygma:

To the “Now” of the coming of the Revealer, there corresponds exactly the “Now” of the proclamation of the word as an historical fact, the “Now” of the present, of the moment. [...] This “Now” of being addressed at a specific moment is the eschatological “Now,” because in it the decision is made between life and death. It is the hour which is coming, and, in being addressed, now is. [...] Therefore it is not true that the parousia, expected by others as an event occurring in time, is now denied or transformed by John into a process within the soul, an experience. Rather, John opens the reader's eyes: the parousia has already occurred!

Bultmann thus regards the fourth gospel as partially reinterpreting the eschatological myth in terms of its significance for human existence. Christ is not a past phenomenon but the ever-present Word of God, expressing not a general truth but a concrete proclamation addressed to us, demanding an existential decision on our part. For Bultmann, the eschatological process became an event in the history of the world, and becomes an event once more in contemporary Christian proclamation.

But such approaches failed to satisfy many critics, who felt that Bultmann had abandoned too many of the central features of the Christian doctrine of hope. For example, Bultmann's notion of eschatology is purely individualist; it is clear that the biblical notion is corporate. Another approach began to emerge within the later 1960s; it seemed to many to offer far more than Bultmann's truncated version of hope.

Jürgen Moltmann (Born 1926): The Theology of Hope

In 1964, the German Protestant theologian Jürgen Moltmann published his Theology of Hope, which created a considerable impact. In this work, Moltmann drew on the insights of Ernst Bloch's (1885–1977) remarkable work The Principle of Hope (1938–47), which set out a neo-Marxist analysis of human experience, based on the belief that all human culture is moved by a passionate hope for the future that transcends all the alienation of the present. Bloch saw himself as standing in direct line to the biblical idea of revolutionary apocalyptic hope. Where Bultmann sought to make eschatology acceptable through demythologization, Bloch defended it by pointing to the vigorous social critique and prophetic vision of social transformation which accompanied the ideas in their original scriptural contexts. Both in Europe and North America, the 1960s saw the outburst of optimism concerning the future of humanity. Everything seemed so hopeful.

Against this background of a secular vision of hope, often grounded in a Marxist ideology, Moltmann argued for the need for the rediscovery of the corporate Christian conception of hope as a central motivating factor in the life and thought of the individual and the church. Eschatology needed to be rescued from its position as “a harmless little chapter at the conclusion of a Christian dogmatics” (Karl Barth) and given pride of place. Moltmann argued that eschatology is of central importance to Christian thinking.

Moltmann's attitude of orientation toward the future, defined and informed by the promises of God, is summarized in slogans such as spes quaerens intellectum (“hope seeking understanding”) and spero, ut intellegam (“I hope, in order that I may understand”). Each of these phrases represents a significant modification of the viewpoint of Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109), who emphasized the importance of faith; Anselm's view was summarized in the slogans fides quaerens intellectum (“faith seeking understanding”) and credo, ut intellegam (“I believe, in order that I may understand”; see p. 34). For Moltmann, Christian theology provides a vision of hope through the transforming work of God, which stands in sharp contrast to secular ideas of hope and social transformation.

If it is hope that maintains and upholds faith and keeps it moving on, if it is hope that draws the believer into the life of love, then it will also be hope that is the mobilizing and driving force of faith's thinking, of its knowledge of and reflections on human nature, history, and society. Faith hopes in order to know what it believes. Hence all its knowledge will be an anticipatory, fragmentary knowledge forming a prelude to the promised future, and as such is committed to hope. [...] The Christian hope is directed towards a novum ultimum, towards a new creation of all things by the God of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. It thereby opens a future outlook that embraces all things, including also death, and into this it can and must also take the limited hopes of a renewal of life, stimulating them, relativizing them, giving them direction.

For Moltmann, the “hope” in question is not individual, existential, or private; it is the public hope of the whole of the creation, as it awaits the renewing work of the “God of hope.” It is therefore imperative that Christianity rediscovers its eschatology and realizes its enormous importance to a world which is longing for hope, and seeking that hope outside the Christian tradition. Only by rediscovering its own theology of hope can the church hope to gain a hearing in a secular culture.

Helmut Thielicke (1908–86): Ethics and Eschatology

One of the most important modern discussions of the theological importance of eschatology stems from the German Lutheran writer Helmut Thielicke. In his major work Theological Ethics (1958–64), Thielicke set out to explore the theological foundations of Christian ethics. Underlying Thielicke's approach to ethics is his dissatisfaction with the classical Lutheran approach to ethics, which speaks of “two kingdoms” or “two realms” of ethics.

Thielicke argues that this approach failed to take eschatology seriously. Throughout the three volumes of his work, he emphasizes “the eschatological character of Christian ethics.” By this he means that Christian ethics must take seriously the New Testament affirmation that the believer and the church exist in a tension between the present age (Thielicke uses the term “aeon”) and the age to come. Both are simultaneously present to the believer, and Christian ethics must recognize the tension between the reality of the present age and the hope of the future age. These two aeons “run concurrently”; both are present to faith. The present age is passing away; the future age is only dawning, and has yet to break in fully. However, its future presence must already have an impact on Christian ethical thinking.

Ethics has its place therefore precisely in the field of tension between the old and the new aeons, not in the old alone, nor in the new alone. [...] The problem of ethics lies in the fact that the two aeons run concurrently during the “last time” – that is, the time between the Ascension and the Last Day. [...] This means that in the strict sense the problem of ethics is a theological problem. For it is posed by the interrelation of the two aeons.

For Thielicke, approaches to ethics which were based purely on secular criteria (such as Kantianism) would inevitably be judged to be deficient from a Christian perspective, on account of their failure to appreciate the eschatology of ethics. While it is probably fair to argue that it remains unclear exactly how Thielicke's emphasis on eschatology affects practical ethical decision-making, it is clear that his analysis has reminded ethicists and theologians alike of the importance of this once-neglected aspect of the Christian faith.

Dispensationalism: The Structures of Eschatology

Dispensationalism is a movement which achieved considerable influence in twentieth-century North American evangelicalism, particularly during the period 1920–70. The term takes its name from its understanding of a series of “dispensations” in the history of salvation. The origins of the movement lie in England with John Nelson Darby (1800–82). However, the movement became of particular significance in the United States under the influence of Cyrus Ingerson

Scofield (1843–1921), whose Scofield Reference Bible (1909) became a milestone in dispensationalist thought.

The most distinctive feature of dispensationalism is its periodization of history. Scofield divided the history of salvation into seven periods or “dispensations,” each of which represents a distinct covenant between God and God's people. These are:

1. Innocence – between creation and the Fall
2. Conscience – between the Fall and Noah's flood
3. Human government – from the flood to the call of Abraham
4. Promise – from Abraham to Moses
5. Law – from Moses to the death of Christ
6. The church – from the resurrection to the present
7. The millennium – the thousand-year period of Christ's rule.

While other schemes of dispensations have been put forward within dispensationalism, Scofield's is widely regarded as the most influential.

One of classic dispensationalism's most significant features is its interpretation of the term “Israel.” For dispensationalists such as Scofield and Charles C. Ryrie (1925–2016), the term “Israel” always designates the earthly Jewish people, and never represents the Christian church. Israel and the church are two totally distinct entities, each with its own history and destiny. “Israel” refers to an earthly people whose hope focuses on an earthly kingdom; “the church” refers to a heavenly people whose destiny lies beyond this world.

Dispensationalists have thus had a particular interest in the modern history of the nation of Israel (founded in 1948), seeing in this development the fulfillment of dispensationalist understandings of the Old Testament. It should be noted that more recent dispensationalist writers have tended to soften this distinction between Israel and the church.

Two central and characteristic notions within dispensationalism are those of “the rapture” and “the tribulation.” The former concerns the believer's expectation of being “caught up in the clouds” to meet Christ at the time of his return (1 Thessalonians 4: 15–17). The latter is grounded in the prophetic visions of the book of Daniel (9: 24–7) and is understood as a seven-year period of divine judgment upon the world. Dispensationalist writers remain divided as to whether “the rapture” is to be understood as “pre-tribulation” (in which believers are enabled to escape the pain of “the tribulation”) or “post-tribulation” (in which believers must endure “the tribulation,” in the assurance that they will subsequently be united with Christ).

Spe Salvi: Benedict XVI (Born 1927) on the Christian Hope

In late 2007, Pope Benedict XVI issued his encyclical Spe salvi, which took its title from Paul's declaration that “in hope we are saved” (Romans 8: 24). (In the Vulgate Latin translation, this reads spe salvi facti sumus.) The document represents one of the most important statements on the Christian hope in recent times, offering both a cultural engagement with secular notions of hope and a restatement of the characteristically Christian approach to the matter.

After a substantial engagement with the idea of hope as found in the New Testament, the encyclical engages secular visions of hope, such as those found in Marxism. Hope was transferred from God to humanity, from the hereafter to the present, from the kingdom of God to the socialist revolution. Yet this secular vision of hope now lies in ruins, confounded by the fact that human nature remains the same. “Theodor W. Adorno formulated the problem of faith in progress quite drastically: he said that progress, seen accurately, is progress from the sling to the atom bomb. [...] The ambiguity of progress becomes evident. Without doubt, it offers new possibilities for good, but it also opens up appalling possibilities for evil.”

In the face of this cultural disillusionment with secular visions of progress, Spe salvi offers a restatement of the Christian vision of hope. The document is notable, not for its statement of any new ideas but for its contextualization of traditional eschatological themes. Two of these may be noted: first, the reassertion of the Christian hope as a realistic claim in the light of the failings of the secular vision and, second, the reaffirmation of the importance of hope in the face of human suffering.

Spe salvi sets out the Christian hope as a principle which enables human beings to cope with the ambiguities of existence by reaffirming the loving presence of God in life's shadows. It provides a reliable and secure framework within which believing humanity can exist and trust, relying on the unconditional love and commitment of the God who became incarnate in Christ, thus demonstrating that faithfulness and commitment by actions, not merely words. The redeemed life is shaped by faith in “a God who is not a remote ‘first cause’ of the world” but who entered into history as a pledge of commitment. The “great, true hope which holds firm in spite of all disappointments can only be God – God who has loved us and who continues to love us to the end, until all is accomplished.”

The encyclical also addresses the issue of human suffering. Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900) accused Christianity of encouraging a mentality which gloried in suffering. Spe salvi takes a more positive approach, noting that the Christian faith has had “the particular merit” of bringing forth within humanity a “new and deeper capacity for these kinds of suffering” that are decisive for our humanity. God suffers for us and with us, an idea that the encyclical refers to as con-solatio (“suffering alongside”).

The Christian faith has shown us that truth, justice and love are not simply ideals, but enormously weighty realities. It has shown us that God – Truth and Love in person – desired to suffer for us and with us. Bernard of Clairvaux coined the marvellous expression: Impassibilis est Deus, sed non incompassibilis – God cannot suffer, but he can suffer with. [...] Hence in all human suffering we are joined by one who experiences and carries that suffering with us; hence con-solatio is present in all suffering, the consolation of God's compassionate love.

The encyclical can thus be seen as a reaffirmation of some very traditional Christian ideas, adapted for a post-Enlightenment world. Some, such as Jürgen Moltmann, have expressed concern that the encyclical fails to extend hope beyond the sphere of the church. Moltmann criticized the omission of reference to “the salvation of a groaning creation and the hope of a new earth where justice dwells.” While there is undoubtedly some merit in such criticisms, Spe salvi represents an important contemporary restatement of the Christian hope.

N. T. Wright (Born 1948) on (not) Going to Heaven

Part of the task of Christian theology is to constantly re-examine its tradition to ensure it has not taken wrong turnings – for example, through a misreading of some biblical passages. In his Surprised by Hope (2008), the New Testament scholar N. T. Wright set out his understanding of the nature of the Christian hope and raised questions about whether traditional concepts of heaven were adequately grounded in the New Testament. Wright's views are important in their own right while at the same time illustrating the dynamic process of exploration and reception of the theological “deposit” of the past, which is so characteristic of Christian theology. His approach also makes it clear why Christian theology needs to remain in constant dialogue with New Testament scholarship rather than treating this as independent of, and possibly irrelevant to, its themes.

In an essay of 2003, Wright argued that the traditional use of the word “heaven” to denote the “ultimate goal of the redeemed” was, despite its popularity, “severely misleading” and did not “do justice to the Christian hope.” A traditional way of conceiving the Christian hope had become the lens by which Christians read the New Testament. When that lens was set to one side, another way of understanding the New Testament's vision of hope could be seen. Its main goal was not about “going to heaven when you die” but about being “bodily raised into the transformed, glorious likeness of Jesus Christ.”

These ideas were developed further in his Surprised by Hope. The core New Testament notion of “resurrection” did not refer to life after death but rather to “new bodily life after whatever sort of life after death there might be.” Wright noted, for example, that the gospel accounts of the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth are not framed in terms of the hope of “life after death” but rather with reference to Christ being the “world's true Lord.” The gospel writers do not tell us that Jesus returned to heaven so that we could follow him there. Instead, they tell us that “Jesus is in heaven, ruling the world, and he will one day return to make that rule complete.” And Christians are called on to take a role in bringing about that renewal of creation:

What [Jesus] was promising for that future, and doing in that present, was not about saving souls for a disembodied eternity but rescuing people from the corruption and decay of the way the world presently is so they could enjoy, already in the present, that renewal of creation which is God's ultimate purpose – and so they could thus become colleagues and partners in that larger project.

For Wright, the Christian hope does not primarily concern what happens to Christians after death but rather affirms the new role they have in God's renewal of the world:

“God's kingdom” in the preaching of Jesus refers not to postmortem destiny, not to our escape from this world into another one, but to God's sovereign rule coming “on earth as it is in heaven.” The roots of this misunderstanding go very deep, not least into the residual Platonism that has infected whole swathes of Christian thinking.

The Last Things

In the remainder of this concluding chapter, we shall consider aspects of Christian teaching concerning the “last things.” These are an integral aspect of Christian life and faith, and have been the subject of considerable theological speculation, especially in popular preaching and writing.

Hell

Interest in hell reached a climax during the Middle Ages, with artists of the period taking, one assumes, a certain delight in portraying the righteous watching sinners being tormented by burning and other means of torture. Commenting on the enthusiasm with which certain Paris theologians wrote about hell, Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) remarked that they had evidently been there themselves! The most graphic portrayal of the medieval view of hell is that of Dante, in the first of the three books of his Divine Comedy. Dante portrays hell as nine circles at the center of the earth, within which Satan dwells. On the gate to hell, Dante notices the inscription “Abandon hope, all ye who enter here!”

The first circle of hell is populated by those who have died without being baptized, and by virtuous pagans (this circle corresponds to the idea of “limbo” noted earlier; p. 431). Dante declares that it is this circle that was visited by Christ during his “descent into hell” between the time of the crucifixion and the resurrection. There is no torment of any kind in this circle. As Dante advances further into hell, he discovers those who are guilty of increasingly serious sins. The second circle is populated by the lustful, the third by the gluttonous, the fourth by the miserly, and the fifth by the wrathful. These circles, taken together, constitute “upper hell.” At no point does Dante refer to fire in this part of hell. Dante then draws upon Greco-Roman mythology in suggesting that the River Styx divides “upper hell” from “lower hell.” Now we encounter fire for the first time. The sixth circle is populated by heretics, the seventh by the violent, the eighth by fraudsters (including several popes), and the ninth by traitors.

This static medieval view of hell was unquestionably of major influence at the time, and continues to be of importance into the modern period. It may be found clearly stated in Jonathan Edwards's (1703–58) famous sermon “Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God,” preached on July 8, 1741:

It would be dreadful to suffer this fierceness and wrath of Almighty God for one moment; but you must suffer it for all eternity. There will be no end to this exquisite horrible misery. [...] You will know that you must wear out long ages, millions of millions of ages, in wrestling and conflicting with this almighty merciless vengeance.

However, the very idea of hell has been subjected to increasing criticisms, of which the following should be noted:

1. Hell's existence is seen as a contradiction of the Christian assertion of the final victory of God over evil. This criticism is especially associated with the patristic writer Origen (c.185–c.254), whose doctrine of universal restoration ultimately rests upon an affirmation of the final and total triumph of God over evil. In the modern period, the philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716) identified this consideration as a major difficulty with the doctrine of hell:

It seems strange that, even in the great future of eternity, evil must triumph over good, under the supreme authority of the one who is the sovereign good. After all, there will be many who are called, and yet few who are chosen or saved.

2. The notion of vindictive justice has seemed un-Christian to many writers, especially in the light of many New Testament passages speaking of the compassion of God. A number of writers, especially during the nineteenth century, found it difficult to reconcile the idea of a loving God with the notion of the continuing vindictive or retributive punishment of sinners. The main difficulty was that there seemed to be no point to the suffering of the condemned.

While answers may be given to these objections, there has been a perceptible loss of interest in the idea of hell in both popular and more academic Christian circles. Evangelistic preaching now seems to concentrate upon the positive affirmation of the love of God, rather than on the negative implications of the rejection of that love. One response to this within evangelical circles has been the development of a doctrine of conditional immortality, to which we may now turn.

Since the early 1980s, a growing internal debate has developed within evangelicalism concerning a network of eschatological issues centering on the issue of immortality. Responding to criticisms of the doctrine of hell made during the modern period, a number of evangelical scholars have developed the doctrine of “conditional immortality.” An example of this may be found in Philip Edgcumbe Hughes's (1915–90) The True Image (1989). Hughes argues that humanity has been created with the potential for immortality:

Immortality or deathlessness is not inherent in the constitution of humanity as a corporeal–spiritual creature; though, formed in the image of God, the potential was there. That potential, which was forfeited through sin, has been restored and actualized through Christ.

Hughes argues that the essence of salvation is the actualization of the potential for immortality, which is conditional upon a response to the gospel. Those who do not respond do not enter into immortality. It therefore follows that no division is necessary between the good and the evil, the believing and the unbelieving, after death. Augustine asserted that “after the resurrection, when the final universal judgment has been completed, there will be two kingdoms, each with its own distinct boundaries, the one Christ's, the other the devil's.” Hughes argues that there will only be one. “When Christ fills all in all [...] how is it conceivable that there can be a section or realm of creation that does not belong to this fullness, and by its very presence contradicts it?”

This trend toward “conditionalism” or “conditional immortality” has met with considerable resistance within evangelicalism, with writers such as James I. Packer (born 1926) opposing it on the grounds of logical inconsistency and a lack of adequate scriptural foundation. It is a debate which is set to continue and perhaps extend further into the Christian community.

Purgatory

One of the major differences between Protestant and Catholic understandings of the “last things” relates to the question of purgatory. Purgatory is perhaps best understood as an intermediate stage in which those who have died in a state of grace are given an opportunity to purge themselves of the guilt of their sins before finally entering heaven. The idea does not have explicit scriptural warrant, although a passage in 2 Maccabees 12: 39–46 (regarded as apocryphal, and hence as lacking in authority, by Protestant writers) speaks of Judas Maccabeus making “propitiation for those who had died, in order that they might be released from their sin.”

The idea was developed during the patristic period. Clement of Alexandria (c.150–c.215) and Origen both taught that those who had died without time to perform works of penance would be “purified through fire” in the next life. The practice of praying for the dead – which became widespread in the eastern church in the first four centuries – exercised a major impact upon theological development and provides an excellent case study of the manner in which liturgy influences theology. What was the point of praying for the dead, it was asked, if those prayers could not alter the state in which they existed? Similar views are found in the writings of Augustine, who taught the need for purification from the sins of the present life before entering the joys of the next.

While the practice of praying for the dead appears to have become well established by the fourth century, the explicit formulation of a notion of “purgatory” seems to date from two centuries later, in the writings of Gregory the Great (c.540–604). In his exposition of Matthew 12: 32, dating from 593 or 594, Gregory picks up the idea of sins which can be forgiven “in the age to come.” He interprets this in terms of a future age in which sins that have not been forgiven on earth may be forgiven subsequently. Note especially the reference to the “purifying fire” (purgatorius ignis), which became incorporated into most medieval accounts of purgatory and from which the term “purgatory” derives:

As for certain lesser faults, we must believe that, before the final judgment, there is a purifying fire, for he who is the truth declares that “whoever utters blasphemy against the Holy Spirit will not be pardoned either in this age, or in the age which is to come” (Matthew 12: 32). From this statement, it is to be understood that certain offences can be forgiven in this age, whereas certain others will be forgiven in the age which is to come.

The theme of a fire which purifies – as opposed to a fire which punishes – was developed further by Catherine of Genoa (1447– 1510) in her Treatise on Purgatory, which probably dates from around the year 1490:

Because the souls in purgatory are without the guilt of sin, there is no obstacle between them and God except their pain, which holds them back so that they cannot reach perfection through this instinct. They can also see that this instinct is held back by a need for righteousness. For this reason, a fierce fire comes into being, which is like that of Hell, with the exception of guilt. This is what makes evil the wills of those who are condemned to Hell, on whom God does not bestow his goodness; they therefore remain in their evil wills, and opposed to the will of God.

The idea of purgatory was rejected by the reformers during the sixteenth century. Two major lines of criticism were directed against it. First, it was held to lack any substantial scriptural foundations. Second, it was inconsistent with the doctrine of justification by faith, which declared that an individual could be put “right with God” through faith, thus establishing a relationship which obviated the need for purgatory. Having dispensed with the idea of purgatory, the reformers saw no pressing reason to retain the practice of prayer for the dead, which was henceforth omitted from Protestant liturgies. Both the concept of purgatory and the practice of praying for the dead continue to find acceptance within Catholicism.

The Millennium

The early Christian discussion of heaven tended to focus on a related yet not identical idea – the millennium, or restored earthly kingdom lasting for a period of one thousand years, intervening between the coming of Christ and the establishment of a totally new cosmic order. This idea, which is based partly on a passage in the book of Revelation (20: 2–5), had considerable appeal to early Christian writers. An excellent example is provided by Irenaeus of Lyons (c.130–c.202) in the second century. The idea of a worldly millennium is, for Irenaeus, confirmed by a number of considerations, especially Christ's promise at the Last Supper to drink wine again with his disciples. How can this happen, he asks, if they are disembodied spirits? The reference to the future drinking of wine is a sure indication that there will be a kingdom of God established upon earth before the final judgment. Perhaps the clearest statement of the idea can be found in the writings of Tertullian (c.160–c.220) in the early third century:

For we also hold that a kingdom has been promised to us on earth, but before heaven: but in another state than this, as being after the resurrection. This will last for a thousand years, in a city of God's own making, the Jerusalem which has been brought down from heaven which the Apostle also designates as “our mother from above” (Galatians 4: 26). When he proclaims that “our politeuma” that is, citizenship, “is in heaven” (Philippians 3: 20), he is surely referring to a heavenly city. [...] We affirm that this is the city established by God for the reception of the saints at the resurrection, and for their refreshment with an abundance of all blessings, spiritual blessings to be sure, in compensation for the blessings we have despised or lost in this age. For indeed it is right and worthy of God that his servants should also rejoice in the place where they suffered hardship for his name. This is the purpose of that kingdom, which will last a thousand years, during which period the saints will rise sooner or later, according to their merit. When the resurrection of the saints is completed, the destruction of the world and the conflagration of judgment will be effected; we shall be “changed in a moment” into the angelic substance, by the “putting on of incorruption” (1 Corinthians 15: 52–3), and we shall be transferred to the heavenly kingdom.

For Tertullian, the millennium was to be a period in which the righteous could be compensated for the suffering which they had endured for their faith, before their final transference to heaven itself.

However, opposition to the idea of a millennium began to grow during the third century. For example, Hippolytus of Rome (170–235) argued that the reference to a period of a thousand years should not be understood as a literal prediction of the chronological duration of an earthly kingdom but as an allegorical indication of the grandeur of the heavenly kingdom. As a result, the theme of the resurrection soon came to be of greater importance to patristic writers.

Yet, in more recent years, the concept of the millennium has come to play a major role in popular Protestant theology and preaching. In what follows, we shall outline the three main positions readers are likely to encounter, along with some of their representatives.

Amillennialism

As we noted above, most writers did not regard the millennium as playing a significant role in Christian expectations for the future. This position was typical of Christian thinking for more or less 1,500 years from about 400. With the establishment of a stable Christian region in western Europe and beyond, interest in eschatology generally diminished. Although writers such as Joachim of Fiore occasionally excited interest in the issue, relatively few mainstream theologians engaged with it in any detail. For example, the Protestant Reformation saw surprisingly little discussion of eschatological issues. Hardly any mainstream Protestant reformer wrote a commentary on the book of Revelation. While there are exceptions, the concept of the millennium played virtually no role for most Christian writers.

However, the rise of positions that place considerable emphasis on the importance of the millennium has led to this position being named “amillennial,” to distinguish it from two alternative positions, to which we now turn.

Premillennialism

This viewpoint, which is associated with (but not limited to) dispensationalism, holds that the figure known as “Antichrist” will appear on earth, ushering in a seven-year period of suffering known as “the tribulation.” As noted above, this was the predominant view in the early church up to about 400. On this account of the end-times, this great period of destruction, war, and disaster on earth will be ended by God defeating evil at the battle of Armageddon. After this,

Christ will return to earth to rule for a period of a thousand years (the millennium itself), during which the forces of evil will finally be conquered. This is often accompanied by a belief in the “pretribulation rapture,” which holds that Christians will be taken up from earth prior to a time of tribulation and the Second Coming. It is important to appreciate that premillennialism offers a strongly pessimistic view of the world, believing that things are deteriorating on earth and will go on doing so until God brings history to an end. Readers wanting to get a better understanding of this approach are recommended to read the best-selling Left Behind novels, written by Tim LaHaye (born 1926) and Jerry B. Jenkins (born 1949), which reflect this viewpoint.

Postmillennialism

This viewpoint rose to prominence within American Protestantism during the nineteenth century. It holds that the return of Christ will occur at the close of a long period (not necessarily lasting one thousand years) of righteousness and peace, commonly called the millennium. Leading conservative Protestant theologians, such as the Princeton academics Charles Hodge (1797–1878) and Benjamin B. Warfield (1851–1921), took the view that God was bringing about his purposes through steady human progress over evil, gradually leading to a Christianized world. Postmillennialism sees the church as playing a major role in transforming whole social structures before the Second Coming, and endeavoring to bring about a “golden age” of peace and prosperity with great advances in education, the arts, sciences, and medicine. Where premillennialism is generally pessimistic in its outlook, postmillennialism is much more optimistic. Its critics argue that its credibility was severely damaged by the suffering and damage of two world wars, both of which increased the appeal of premillennialism, especially in North America.

Heaven

The Christian conception of heaven is essentially that of the eschatological realization of the presence and power of God, and the final elimination of sin. The most helpful way of considering it is to regard it as a consummation of the Christian doctrine of salvation, in which the presence, penalty, and power of sin have all been finally eliminated and the total presence of God in individuals and the community of faith has been achieved (see pp. 250–1).

It should be noted that the New Testament parables of heaven are strongly communal in nature; for example, heaven is portrayed as a banquet, as a wedding feast, or as a city – the new Jerusalem. Individualist interpretations of heaven or eternal life can also be argued to be inadequate, on account of the Christian understanding of God as Trinity. Eternal life is thus not a projection of an individual human existence but is rather to be seen as sharing, with the redeemed community as a whole, in the community of a loving God.

The term “heaven” is used frequently in the Pauline writings of the New Testament. Although it is natural to think of heaven as a future entity, Paul's thinking appears to embrace both a future reality and a spiritual sphere or realm which coexists with the material world of space and time. Thus “heaven” is referred to both as the future home of the believer (2 Corinthians 5: 1–2; Philippians 3: 20) and as the present dwelling place of Jesus Christ from which he will come in final judgment (Romans 10: 6; 1 Thessalonians 1: 10, 4: 16).

One of Paul's most significant statements concerning heaven focuses on the notion of believers being “citizens of heaven” (Philippians 3: 20) and in some way sharing in the life of heaven in the present. The tension between the “now” and the “not yet” (see pp. 250–1, 270–1) is evident in Paul's statements concerning heaven, making it very difficult to sustain the simple idea of heaven as something which will not come into being until the future, or which cannot be experienced in the present.

Particularly in the Greek-speaking church, speculation focused on the nature of the resurrection body. What kind of body would believers possess when they were finally raised from the dead? The emphasis on the millennium had diverted attention away from this question, in that it had focused on the physical restoration of believers in an earthly realm, in which they retained human bodies. Yet the focus now shifted to the resurrection itself, with Origen soon being established as a leading thinker on this issue.

Origen found himself obliged to defend the doctrine of the resurrection against two rival teachings, each of which seemed to him to be perversions of the Christian faith. On the one hand, some writers had argued that the resurrection was simply a reconstitution of the human body, including all of its physical aspects and functions, on the last day. On the other, Gnostic critics of Christianity argued that anything material was evil, and thus rejected any understanding of the resurrection which included reference to physical elements. For Origen, it was clear that the resurrection body was a purely spiritual entity. Instead of having physical aspects suitable to life on earth, the resurrection body is adapted to the spiritual life of heaven. In part, this reflected his Platonist presuppositions, most notably the Platonic doctrine of the immortality of the soul:

By the command of God the body which was earthly and animal will be replaced by a spiritual body, such as may be able to dwell in heaven; even on those who have been of lower worth, even of contemptible, almost negligible merit, the glory and worth of the body will be bestowed in proportion to the deserts of the life and soul of each.

However, Origen also insisted that the resurrection body possessed the same “form” (Greek: eidos) as the earthly body. The resurrection thus involved a spiritual transformation without loss of individual identity. However, the approach adopted by Origen seemed to many to involve the radical separation of body and soul. This dualism had its origins in Greek philosophy rather than in Scripture.

According to some of his later critics, Origen's Platonism also shows itself in another aspect of his teaching concerning the resurrection body. In the sixth century, the Roman emperor Justinian (483–565; reigned 527–65) criticized Origen for teaching that the resurrection body was spherical. In his dialogue Timaeus, Plato had argued that the sphere was the perfect shape, and it is thus possible that Origen may have included this belief in his teaching. However, there is no explicit mention of this notion in any of Origen's known writings.

This type of approach is found in a modified version in the writings of Methodius of Olympus (died c.311), one of Origen's more severe critics. Methodius argued that Origen could not really speak of "the resurrection of the body," for the simple reason that it was not the body that was raised but some elusive "form." In his dialogue with Aglaophon, dating from around 300, Methodius offers another approach, which retains an emphasis on the physical reality of the future resurrection of the body, based on the analogy of the melting down and recasting of a metal statue:

So it seems that it is as if some skilled artificer had made a noble image, cast in gold or other material, which was beautifully proportioned in all its features; then the artificer suddenly notices that the image had been defaced by some envious person, who could not endure its beauty, and so decided to ruin it for the sake of the pointless pleasure of satisfying his jealousy. So the craftsman decides to recast this noble image. Now notice, most wise Aglaophon, that if he wants to ensure that this image, on which he has expended so much effort, care, and work, will be totally free from any defect, he will be obliged to melt it down, and restore it to its former condition. [...] Now it seems to me that God's plan was much the same as this human example. [...] God dissolved humanity once more into its original materials, so that it could be remodeled in such a way that all its defects could be eliminated and disappear. Now the melting down of a statue corresponds to the death and dissolution of the human body, and the remolding of the material to the resurrection after death.

Origen's approach was also criticized by Augustine of Hippo, who interpreted Paul's statements concerning the spiritual nature of the resurrection body in terms of submission to the Spirit, rather than a purely spiritual body.

So what does the resurrection body look like? What will people look like in heaven? If someone dies at the age of 60, will they appear in the streets of the New Jerusalem looking like a 60-year-old? And, if someone dies at the age of 10, will they appear as a child? This issue caused the spilling of much theological ink, especially during the Middle Ages. By the end of the thirteenth century, an emerging consensus can be discerned. As each person reaches their peak of perfection around the age of 30, they will be resurrected as they would have appeared at that time – even if they never lived to reach that age. The New Jerusalem will thus be populated by men and women as they would appear at the age of 30, but with every blemish removed. Since Christ was aged about 30 at the time of his death, this is to be regarded as a perfect age – and is hence the apparent age of those raised to glory in heaven. Peter Lombard (c.1100–60) discusses the matter in a manner typical of his time:

A boy who dies immediately after being born will be resurrected in that form which he would have had if he had lived to the age of thirty years, hindered by no defect of his body. So it can be seen that this substance, which is so small in birth, becomes so great in the resurrection, on account of its being multiplied in itself and of itself. From this, it can be seen that, even if he had lived, the substance would not have come from another source, but would have increased by itself, just as Adam's rib, from which the woman was made, and as the loaves were multiplied in the Gospels.

Honorius of Autun (1080–1154) made much the same point a century later: “All the dead – an infant of one year as much as a man of ninety – will rise with the same age and size as Christ when he rose, namely, thirty years old.”

The great Franciscan theologian Bonaventure of Bagnoregio (c.1217–74) saw this idea as being implied by a passage in the New Testament, which spoke of believers finally attaining a “perfect humanity,” in accordance with the “measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ (Ephesians 4: 13). Bonaventure interpreted this passage as teaching that the physical status of Jesus of Nazareth at the time of his death was normative for the resurrection body.

“Perfect grace conforms us to Christ our head, in whom there was [...] perfect age, due stature, and fair appearance.” All physical blemishes and impediments are healed or removed through the resurrection.

Those who died in childhood will be raised by divine power at an age corresponding to that of Christ at his resurrection (although not with exactly the same physical size). The old and emaciated will be restored to what they were at that age. Giants and dwarves will have their proper stature bestowed upon them. And so all shall come forth, whole and perfect, to the perfect humanity, to “the measure of the full stature of Christ” (Ephesians 4: 13).

Subsequent Christian discussion on the resurrection body has attempted to explore the tension between physical and spiritual approaches to the issue. It must be said, however, that the debate is widely regarded as speculative and pointless. Other debates which are also viewed in this light include the question of whether there are relative grades or ranks among those in heaven. The fifth-century writer Theodoret of Cyrrhus (c.393–c.457) argued that, since there were “many rooms in the Father's house” (John 14: 2), it followed that the relative status and privileges of those in heaven were determined by their achievements during their lives. This doctrine of “status by merit” was continued in the writings of Ambrose of Milan and echoed in medieval theology.

At the time of the Reformation this doctrine came into disrepute, partly due to the Protestant dislike of the idea of “merit” in general. However, the notion of various degrees of blessedness seems to have lingered on in the Puritan devotional writings of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Thus, William Fulke (1539–89) recognized a variation in degrees of glory in heaven, but put this down to God's gracious ordering of things rather than any merits on the part of those specially favored:

As the stars differ in glory, not according to their merits, but according to God's gifts in their creation; so the bodies of the saints shall differ in glory, not according to their merits, but according to God's free gift in the resurrection.

One aspect of the Christian expectation of heaven merits especial attention in closing this work: the beatific vision. The Christian is finally granted a full vision of the God who has up to this point been known only in part. This vision of God in the full splendor of the divine majesty has been a constant theme of much Christian theology, especially during the Middle Ages. Dante's Divine Comedy concludes with the poet finally capturing a glimpse of God: “the love which moves the sun and the other stars.” The anticipation of the wonder and glory of this vision was seen as a powerful incentive to keep going in the Christian life. As the English poet John Donne (1572–1631) put it three centuries later: “No man ever saw God and lived. And yet, I shall not live till I see God; and when I have seen him, I shall never die.”

Christian theology can never fully capture that vision of God. But it can at least challenge us to think more deeply about God, and cause us to get excited about its themes. Perhaps it might even whet our appetites for what is yet to come – surely a fitting note on which to end this basic introduction to its themes.

JARGON-BUSTING: A GLOSSARY OF THEOLOGICAL TERMS

Like every professional academic discipline, Christian theology has developed its own distinct vocabulary, which needs to be explained to those encountering it for the first time. The main body of this work introduces most of these terms. However, many readers value additional help in “jargon-busting.” This section provides a brief discussion of a series of technical terms that the reader is likely to encounter in the course of reading texts which relate to Christian theology, many of which occur in the present work.

adoptionism

The heretical view that Jesus was “adopted” as the Son of God at some point during his ministry (usually his baptism), as opposed to the orthodox teaching that Jesus was the Son of God by nature from the moment of his conception.

aggiornamento

The process of renewing the Catholic church, which was particularly associated with Pope John XXIII (1881–1963) and the Second Vatican Council (1962–5). The Italian word can be translated as a “bringing up to date” or “renewal,” and refers to the process of theological, spiritual, and institutional renewal and updating which resulted from the work of this council.

Alexandrian School

A patristic school of thought, especially associated with the city of Alexandria in Egypt, noted for its Christology (which placed emphasis upon the divinity of Christ) and its method of biblical interpretation (which employed allegorical methods of exegesis). A rival approach in both areas was associated with Antioch (see Antiochene School).

allegory

An understanding of how biblical texts are to be interpreted which sees certain biblical images as possessing deep, spiritual meanings which can be uncovered by their interpreters.

Anabaptism

A term derived from the Greek word for “rebaptizer” and used to refer to the radical wing of the sixteenth-century Reformation, based on thinkers such as Balthasar Hubmaier (1480–1528) and Menno Simons (1496–1551).

analogy of being (analogia entis)

The theory, especially associated with Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), that there exists a correspondence or analogy between the created order and God, as a result of the divine creatorship. The idea gives theoretical justification to the practice of drawing conclusions from the known objects and relationships of the natural order concerning God.

analogy of faith (analogia fidei)

The theory, especially associated with Karl Barth (1886–1968), which holds that any correspondence between the created order and God is only established on the basis of the self-revelation of God.

anthropomorphism

The tendency to ascribe human features (such as hands or arms) or other human characteristics to God.

Antiochene School

A patristic school of thought, especially associated with the city of Antioch in modern-day Turkey, noted for its Christology (which placed emphasis upon the humanity of Christ) and its method of biblical interpretation (which employed literal methods of exegesis). A rival approach in both areas was associated with Alexandria (see Alexandrian School).

anti-Pelagian writings

The writings of Augustine of Hippo (354–430) relating to the Pelagian controversy, in which he defended his views on grace and justification. See also Pelagianism.

apocalyptic

A type of writing or religious outlook which focuses on the last things and the end of the world, often taking the form of visions with complex symbolism. The second half of the book of Daniel (Old Testament) and the book of Revelation (New Testament) are examples of this type of writing.

apologetics

The area of Christian theology which focuses on the defense of the Christian faith, particularly through the rational justification of Christian belief and doctrines.

apophatic

An approach to theology which stresses that God cannot be known in terms of human categories. "Apophatic" (which derives from the Greek apophasis, "negation" or "denial") approaches to theology are especially associated with the monastic tradition of the eastern Orthodox church.

apostolic era

The period of the Christian church, regarded as definitive by many, bounded by the resurrection of Jesus Christ (c.ad 35) and the death of the last apostle (c.ad 90). The ideas and practices of this period were and are widely regarded as normative, at least in some sense or to some degree, in many church circles.

appropriation

The aspect of the doctrine of the Trinity which affirms that, while all three persons are active in all the outward actions of the Trinity, it is appropriate to think of those actions as being the particular work of one of the persons. Thus, it is appropriate to think of creation as the work of the Father and redemption as the work of the Son, despite the fact that all three persons are present and active in both these works.

Arianism

A major early Christological heresy which treated Jesus Christ as supreme among God's creatures and denied his divine status. The Arian controversy was of major importance in the development of Christology during the fourth century.

atonement

An English term coined in 1526 by William Tyndale to translate the Latin term reconciliatio. It has since come to have the developed meaning of “the work of Christ” or “the benefits of Christ gained for believers by his death and resurrection.”

Barthian

The theological outlook of the Swiss theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968), noted chiefly for its emphasis upon the priority of revelation and its focus upon Jesus Christ. The terms “neo-orthodoxy” and “dialectical theology” are also used in this connection.

beatific vision

The full vision of God, which takes place after death through being freed from the limitations of human nature. Some writers, including Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74), taught that certain favored individuals – such as Moses and Paul – were allowed this vision in the present life.

Beatitudes

The eight promises of blessing found in the opening section of the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5: 3–11). Examples include “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” and “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called children of God.”

Calvinism

An ambiguous term, used with two quite distinct meanings. First, it refers to the religious ideas of religious bodies (such as the Reformed church) and individuals (such as Theodore Beza, 1519–1605) who were profoundly influenced by John Calvin (1509–64) or by documents written by him. Second, it refers to the religious ideas of John Calvin himself. Although the first sense is by far the more common, there is a growing recognition that the term is misleading.

Cappadocian fathers

The three major Greek-speaking writers of the patristic period: Gregory of Nazianzus (329–89), Basil of Caesarea (c.330–79), and Gregory of Nyssa (c.335–c.394), all of whom wrote in the late fourth century. “Cappadocia” designates the area in Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey) in which these writers were based.

Cartesianism

The philosophical outlook especially associated with René Descartes (1596–1650), particularly in relation to its emphasis on the separation of the knower from the known and its insistence that the existence of the individual thinking self is the proper starting point for philosophical reflection.

catechism

A popular manual of Christian doctrine, usually in the form of question and answer, intended for religious instruction.

catharsis

The process of cleansing or purification by which the individual is freed from obstacles to spiritual growth and development.

catholic

An adjective which is used both to refer to the universality of the church in space and time and also to a particular church body (sometimes also known as the Catholic church) which lays emphasis upon this point.

Chalcedonian definition

The formal declaration at the Council of Chalcedon (451) that Jesus Christ was to be regarded as having two natures, one human and one divine.

charisma, charismatic

A set of terms especially associated with the gifts of the Holy Spirit. In medieval theology, the term “charisma” was used to designate a spiritual gift, conferred upon individuals by the grace of God. Since the early twentieth century, the term “charismatic” has come to refer to styles of theology and worship which place particular emphasis upon the immediate presence and experience of the Holy Spirit.

Charismatic movement

A form of Christianity which places particular emphasis upon the personal experience of the Holy Spirit in the life of the individual and community, often associated with various “charismatic” phenomena, such as speaking in tongues.

Christology

The section of Christian theology dealing with the identity of Jesus Christ, particularly the question of the relationship between his human and divine natures.

circumincessio

See perichoresis.

conciliarism

An understanding of ecclesiastical or theological authority which places an emphasis on the role of ecumenical councils in determining matters of faith and conduct.

confession

Although the term refers primarily to the admission to sin, it acquired a rather different technical sense in the sixteenth century – that of a document which embodies the principles of faith of a Protestant church, such as the Lutheran Augsburg Confession (1530), which embodies the ideas of early Lutheranism, and the Reformed First Helvetic Confession (1536).

consubstantial

A Latin term, deriving from the Greek term homoousios, literally meaning “of the same substance.” The term is used to affirm the full divinity of Jesus Christ, particularly in opposition to Arianism.

consubstantiation

The theory of the real presence especially associated with Martin Luther (1483–1546), which holds that the substance of the eucharistic bread and wine are given together with the substance of the body and blood of Christ.

contemplation

A form of prayer, distinguished from meditation, in which the individual avoids or minimizes the use of words and images in order to experience the presence of God directly.

creed

A formal definition or summary of the Christian faith, held in common by all Christians. The most important are those generally known as the “Apostles' Creed” and the “Nicene Creed.”

Deism

A term used to refer to the views of a group of English writers, especially during the seventeenth century, whose rationalism anticipated many of the ideas of the Enlightenment. The term is often used to refer to a view of God which recognizes the divine creatorship yet which rejects the notion of a continuing divine involvement with the world.

dialectical theology

The school of thought especially associated with the Swiss theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968) and his associates in the 1920s, which emphasized the tensions, paradoxes, and contradictions in the relationship between God and humanity and the absolute gulf fixed between the human and the divine.

Docetism

An early Christological heresy which treated Jesus Christ as a purely divine being who only had the “appearance” of being human.

Donatism

A movement, centering upon Roman North Africa in the fourth century, which developed a rigid view of the church and sacraments.

doxology

A form of praise, usually especially associated with formal Christian worship. A “doxological” approach to theology stresses the importance of praise and worship in theological reflection.

Ebionitism

An early Christological heresy which treated Jesus Christ as a purely human figure, although recognizing that he was endowed with particular charismatic gifts which distinguished him from other humans.

ecclesiology

The section of Christian theology dealing with the theory of the church.

Enlightenment

The movement in western culture, dating from about 1750, which placed an emphasis upon human reason and autonomy. It became characteristic of much of western European and North American thought during the eighteenth century.

eschatology

The section of Christian theology dealing with the “last things,” especially the ideas of resurrection, hell, the Last Judgment, and eternal life.

Eucharist

The term used in the present volume to refer to the sacrament variously known as “the mass,” “the Lord's Supper,” and “holy communion.”

evangelical

A term initially used to refer to reforming movements, especially in Germany and Switzerland, in the 1510s and 1520s but now used of a movement, especially in English-language theology, which places especial emphasis upon the supreme authority of Scripture and the atoning death of Christ.

exegesis

The science of textual interpretation, usually referring specifically to the Bible. The term “biblical exegesis” basically means “the process of interpreting the Bible.” The specific techniques employed in the exegesis of Scripture are usually referred to as “hermeneutics.”

exemplarism

A particular approach to the atonement which stresses the moral or religious example set to believers by Jesus Christ.

fathers

An alternative term for the “patristic writers.”

fideism

An understanding of Christian theology which refuses to accept the need for (or sometimes the possibility of) criticism or evaluation by sources outside the Christian faith itself.

filioque

A Latin term, literally meaning “and from the Son,” found in western versions of the Nicene Creed. On this view, the Holy Spirit originates and proceeds from both the Father and the Son, rather than (as in the eastern church) from the Father alone.

Five Ways

The five “arguments for the existence of God” associated with Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74).

fourth gospel

The gospel according to John. The term highlights the distinctive literary and theological character of this gospel, which sets it apart from the common structures of the first three gospels, usually known as the “synoptic gospels.”

fundamentalism

A form of Protestant Christianity, originating in America, which lays especial emphasis upon the authority of the Bible and is highly suspicious of biblical criticism.

hermeneutics

The principles underlying the interpretation, or exegesis, of a text, particularly of Scripture, and particularly in relation to its present-day application.

hesychasm

A tradition, especially associated with the eastern church, which places considerable emphasis upon the idea of “inner quietness” (Greek: hesychia) as a means of achieving a vision of God. It is particularly associated with writers such as Simeon the New Theologian (949–1022) and Gregory Palamas (c.1296–1357).

historical Jesus

A term used, especially during the nineteenth century, to refer to the historical person of Jesus of Nazareth, as opposed to the Christian interpretation of that person, especially as presented in the New Testament and the creeds.

historico-critical method

An approach to historical texts, including the Bible, which argues that their proper meaning must be determined on the basis of the specific historical conditions under which they were written.

history of religions school

The approach to religious history, and Christian origins in particular, which treats Old and New Testament developments as responses to encounters with other religions, such as Gnosticism.

homoousios

A Greek term, literally meaning “of the same substance,” which came to be used extensively during the fourth century to designate the mainstream Christological belief that Jesus Christ was of the same substance as God. The term was polemical, being directed against the Arian view that Christ was “of similar substance [homoiousios]” to God. See also “consubstantial.”

humanism

In the strict sense of the word, an intellectual movement linked with the European Renaissance. At the heart of the movement lay not (as the modern sense of the word might suggest) a set of secular or secularizing ideas but a new interest in the cultural achievements of antiquity. These were seen as a major resource for the renewal of European culture and Christianity during the period of the Renaissance. In the recent past, “humanism” has come to mean a worldview hostile to religion, which was not its original meaning.

hypostatic union

The doctrine of the union of divine and human natures in Jesus Christ, without confusion of their respective substances.

icons

Sacred pictures, particularly of Jesus, which play a significant role in Orthodox spirituality as “windows for the divine.”

ideology

A group of beliefs and values, usually secular, which govern the actions and outlooks of a society or group of people.

incarnation

A term used to refer to the assumption of human nature by God, in the person of Jesus Christ. The term “incarnationalism” is often used to refer to theological approaches which lay especial emphasis upon God becoming human.

justification by faith, doctrine of

The section of Christian theology dealing with how the individual sinner is able to enter into fellowship with God. The doctrine was to prove to be of major significance at the time of the Reformation.

kenoticism

A form of Christology which lays emphasis upon Christ's “laying aside” of certain divine attributes in the incarnation, or his “emptying himself” of at least some divine attributes, especially omniscience or omnipotence.

kerygma

A term used, especially by Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) and his followers, to refer to the essential message or proclamation of the New Testament concerning the significance of Jesus Christ.

liberal Protestantism

A movement, especially associated with nineteenth-century Germany, which stressed the continuity between religion and culture, flourishing between the time of F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) and Paul Tillich (1886–1965).

liberation theology

Although this term designates any theological movement that lays emphasis upon the liberating impact of the gospel, the term has come to refer to a movement which developed in Latin America in the late 1960s and which stressed the role of political action and oriented itself toward the goal of political liberation from poverty and oppression.

liturgy

The written text and set forms of public services, especially of the Eucharist. In the Greek Orthodox church, the word “liturgy” often means “the [liturgy of the] Eucharist.”

logos

A Greek term meaning “word” which played a crucial role in the development of patristic Christology. Jesus Christ was recognized as the “Word of God”; the question concerned the implications of this recognition, and especially the way in which the divine logos in Jesus Christ related to his human nature.

Lutheranism

The religious ideas associated with Martin Luther (1483–1546), particularly as expressed in the Lesser Catechism (1529) and the Augsburg Confession (1530).

Manicheism

A strongly fatalist position associated with the Manichees, to which Augustine of Hippo (354–430) attached himself during his early period. A distinction is drawn between two different divinities, one of which is regarded as evil and the other good. Evil is thus seen as the direct result of the influence of the evil god.

modalism

A trinitarian heresy which treats the three persons of the Trinity as different “modes” of the Godhead. A typical modalist approach is to regard God as active as Father in creation, as Son in redemption, and as Spirit in sanctification.

monophysitism

The doctrine that there is only one nature in Christ, which is divine (from the Greek words monos, “only one,” and physis, “nature”).

This view differed from the orthodox view, upheld by the Council of Chalcedon (451), that Christ has two natures, one divine and one human.

neo-orthodoxy

A term used to designate the general position of Karl Barth (1886–1968), especially the manner in which he drew upon the theological concerns of the period of Reformed orthodoxy.

ontological argument

A term used to refer to the type of argument for the existence of God especially associated with the scholastic theologian Anselm of Canterbury (c.1033–1109). It claims that, as God is greater than any other being that is conceivable, God must be greater than any being who exists only as an idea, so God must necessarily exist in reality.

orthodoxy

A term used in a number of senses, of which the following are the most important: orthodoxy in the sense of “right belief,” as opposed to heresy; Orthodoxy in the sense of the forms of Christianity that are dominant in Russia and Greece; and orthodoxy in the sense of a movement within Protestantism, especially in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, which laid emphasis upon the need for doctrinal definition.

parousia

A Greek term, which literally means “coming” or “arrival,” used to refer to the Second Coming of Christ. The notion of the parousia is an important aspect of Christian understandings of the “last things.”

patripassianism

A theological heresy, which arose during the third century, associated with writers such as Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius, focusing on the belief that the Father suffered as the Son. In other words, the suffering of Christ on the cross is to be regarded as the suffering of the Father. According to these writers, the only distinction within the Godhead was a succession of modes or operations, so that Father, Son, and Spirit were just different modes of being, or expressions, of the same basic divine entity.

patristic

An adjective used to refer to the first centuries in the history of the church, following the writing of the New Testament (the “patristic period”), or thinkers writing during this period (the “patristic writers”). For many writers, the period thus designated seems to be c.100–451 (in other words, the period between the completion of the last of the New Testament writings and the landmark Council of Chalcedon).

Pelagianism

An understanding of how humans are able to merit their salvation which is diametrically opposed to that of Augustine of Hippo (354–430), placing considerable emphasis upon the role of human works and playing down the idea of divine grace.

perichoresis

A term relating to the doctrine of the Trinity, often also referred to by the Latin term circumincessio. The basic notion is that all three persons of the Trinity mutually share in the life of the others, so that none is isolated or detached from the actions of the others.

Pietism

An approach to Christianity, especially associated with German writers in the seventeenth century, which places an emphasis upon the personal appropriation of faith and the need for holiness in Christian living. The movement is perhaps best known within the English-language world in the form of Methodism.

postliberalism

A theological movement, especially associated with Duke University and Yale Divinity School in the 1980s, which criticized the liberal reliance upon human experience and reclaimed the notion of community tradition as a controlling influence in theology.

postmodernism

A cultural development, starting in the late twentieth century, which resulted from the general collapse of confidence in the universal rational principles of the Enlightenment. It is characterized by a rejection of absolutes and of objective and rational attempts to define reality.

praxis

A Greek term, literally meaning “action,” adopted by Karl Marx (1818–83) to emphasize the importance of action in relation to thinking. This emphasis on “praxis” has had a considerable impact within Latin American liberation theology.

Protestantism

A term used in the aftermath of the Diet of Speyer (1529) to designate those who “protested” against the practices and beliefs of the Catholic church. Prior to 1529, such individuals and groups had referred to themselves as “evangelicals.”

Quadrīga

The Latin term used to refer to the “fourfold” interpretation of Scripture according to its literal, allegorical, tropological moral, and analogical senses.

radical Reformation

A term used with increasing frequency to refer to the Anabaptist movement – in other words, the wing of the Reformation that went beyond what Martin Luther (1483–1546) and Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) envisaged, particularly in relation to the doctrine of the church.

Reformed

The tradition of theology which draws inspiration from the writings of John Calvin (1509–64) and his successors. This term is now generally used in preference to “Calvinist,” although this is still encountered regularly in the literature.

Sabellianism

An early trinitarian heresy which treated the three persons of the Trinity as different historical manifestations of the one God. It is generally regarded as a form of modalism.

sacrament

A church service or rite which was held to have been instituted by Jesus Christ himself. Although Catholic theology and church practice recognize seven such sacraments (baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, marriage, ordination, penance, and unction), Protestant theologians generally argue that only two (baptism and Eucharist) are to be found in the New Testament itself.

schism

A deliberate break with the unity of the church, condemned vigorously by influential writers of the early church such as Cyprian of Carthage (died 258) and Augustine of Hippo (354–430).

scholasticism

A particular approach to Christian theology, associated especially with the Middle Ages, which lays emphasis upon the rational justification and systematic presentation of Christian theology.

Scripture principle

The theory, especially associated with Reformed theologians, that the practices and beliefs of the church should be grounded in Scripture. Nothing that could not be demonstrated to be grounded in Scripture could be regarded as binding upon the believer. The phrase sola scriptura, “by Scripture alone,” is often encountered as a summary of this principle.

Socinianism

A form of Christian heterodoxy especially associated with the Italian writer Fausto Paolo Sozzini (1539–1604), better known by his Latinized name “Socinus.” Although Socinus was noted for his specific criticisms of the doctrine of the Trinity and the incarnation, the term “Socinian” has come to refer particularly to the idea that Christ's death on the cross did not have any supernatural or transcendent implications. On this view, Christ died as an outstanding moral example, to encourage humanity to avoid sin, not to make satisfaction for human sin.

soteriology

The section of Christian theology dealing with the doctrine of salvation (Greek: soteria).

synoptic gospels

A term used to refer to the first three gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke). The term (derived from the Greek word synopsis, “summary”) refers to the way in which the three gospels can be seen as providing similar “summaries” of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

synoptic problem

The scholarly question of how the three synoptic gospels relate to each other.

theodicy

A term coined by the German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716) to refer to a theoretical justification of the goodness of God in the face of the presence of evil in the world.

theopaschitism

A disputed teaching, regarded by some as a heresy, which arose during the sixth century, associated with writers such as John Maxentius and the slogan “one of the Trinity was crucified.” The formula can be interpreted in a perfectly orthodox sense and was defended as such by Leontius of Byzantium (c.500–c.543). However, it was regarded as potentially misleading and confusing by more cautious writers, including Pope Hormisdas (450–523), and the formula gradually fell into disuse.

theotokos

Literally, “the bearer of God.” A Greek term used to refer to Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, with the intention of reinforcing the central insight of the doctrine of the incarnation – that is, that Jesus Christ is none other than God. The term was extensively used by writers of the eastern church, especially around the time of the Nestorian controversy, to articulate both the divinity of Christ and the reality of the incarnation.

Thomism

A term used to refer to the ideas of the leading medieval theologian and philosopher Thomas Aquinas (c.1225–74). The related term “neo-Thomism” is often used to refer to variants of classical Thomism, particularly those developed in the twentieth century by Joseph Maréchal (1878–1944), Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), and Étienne Gilson (1884–1978).

transubstantiation

The doctrine according to which the bread and the wine are transformed into the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist, while retaining their outward appearance.

Trinity

The distinctively Christian doctrine of God, which reflects the complexity of the Christian experience of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The doctrine is usually summarized in maxims such as “three persons, one God.”

two natures, doctrine of

A term generally used to refer to the doctrine of the two natures, human and divine, of Jesus Christ. Related terms include “Chalcedonian definition” and “hypostatic union.”

typology

A way of interpreting the Bible which sees certain Old Testament figures and events as anticipating aspects of the gospel. Thus, Noah's ark is seen as a “type” (Greek: typos, “figure”) of the church.

Vulgate

The Latin translation of the Bible, largely deriving from Jerome (c.347–420), upon which medieval theology was largely based.

Zwinglianism

The thought of Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) in general, especially his views on the “real presence” (which for Zwingli was more of a “real absence”).
